It has come to my attention that The FDA does not require the trans-fa content of foods to be listed on labels alongside saturated fat.

This to me is not fair to the American public. We deserve to have a chance to see what is really in the food that we consume. The trans-fat content is indeed a far more ~~dam~~ significant health threat to us than the saturated fat.

Why is this threat being ignored?

Does not the american public have the right to see what they are eating?

The general public is completely able to make wise health decisions provided that they are given full information

Thank you
