Dear Dr. Jane Henney,

I am writing to urge you to use your leadership in the Food and Drug Administration to bring about the ban of human antiobiotics being used on livestock. Feeding cattle and other livestock daily doses of antiobiotics creates a condition in which bacteria quickly develop resistance to these drugs. Whatever benefit that could possibly be gained by this procedure is surely outweighed by the risk of creating drug resistant bacteria that could ravage the human population - who would have little defense left.

Antibiotics were developed to save human lives - not to bulk up cattle. How many diseases will become untreatable while the FDA drags its feet?

Sincerely,
Jennifer Crispin
