Food Chemicals Codex

Enzyme effectiveness or potency depends on activity, not weight. Since there isn't necessarily a direct relationship between weight and units of activity, weight measurements should not be relied upon as indicators of enzyme potency.

The system for determining potency of fungal and bacterial enzymes, used by the American food industry, is derived from the Food Chemicals Codex (FCC), the accepted standard of the Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

The FCC is published by the National Academy Press and is a FDA-funded project developed in cooperation with the Food and Nutrition Board and the National Research Council. The FCC is similar in function to the United States Pharmacopoeia (USP), which specifies methods to determine the potency of pancreatic enzymes.

Not all manufacturers use FCC units and are not required to do so by law. The enzyme activity of NESS products is measured and reported in FCC units, as follows:

Protease	HUT	(Hemoglobin Unit Tyrosine base)
Amylase	DU	(Alpha-amylase Dextrinizing Units)
Lipase	LU	(Lipase Unit)
Cellulase	CU	(Cellulase Unit)
Invertase	IAU	(Invertase Activity Unit)
Lactase	ALU	(Lactase Unit)
Maltase	DP ^o	(degrees Diastatic Power)
