Part 2: Identity, Manufacture, Specifications, and Physical or Technical Effect

2.1 Identification

Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®], a branded form of hypromellose acetate succinate (HPMCAS), is a partially esterified derivative of hydroxypropyl methylcellulose (HPMC), aka hypromellose. HPMC (CAS #9004-65-3) is an odorless and tasteless powder, consisting of a cellulose backbone with ether-linked methyl and hydroxypropyl side groups attached to the cellulose chain hydroxyl groups. The level of methyl and hydroxypropyl substitution influence the physical properties of HPMC.

HPMCAS (CAS #71138-97-1) is a tasteless, white to yellowish powder or granules with a faint acetic acid-like odor. It is manufactured by introducing acetyl and succinyl groups to the hydroxyl groups of HPMC (see Figure 1). As with HPMC, various grades of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS are manufactured, possessing slightly different physical properties (particle size and pH range) due to the level of chemical substitution.

2.2 Manufacturing

2.2.1 Manufacturing Overview

To produce Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS, acetyl and succinyl groups are introduced to hydroxyl groups of the hypromellose backbone of. The product is purified and, ground to a uniform powder. The manufacturing process is as follows:

1. Dissolve hypromellose in glacial acetic acid in a reactor.

2. Heat and mix the two esterifiers (acetic anhydride and succinic anhydride) and catalyst (sodium acetate) together.
3. After the designated reaction time, the product paste is transferred to water tank and the polymer (HPMCAS) is precipitated by agitation as water is a poor solvent.
4. Wash the polymer using additional water by mixing / decantation, centrifuge to dehydrate and then dry the polymer.
5. Sieve, blend and pack to finalize G (granular) and MP (mid-sized particle) grades. If the F (fine) grade, then mill before sieving, blending and packing.

2.2.2 Good Manufacturing Practice

Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS, manufactured by Shin-Etsu, is produced under strict adherence to current GMP.

2.2.3 Raw Materials

Hypromellose USP, also produced by Shin-Etsu, is used to produce Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS. It is a low viscosity grade ranging from 2–15 mPa•s. The materials used to produce hypromellose conform to the Japanese Pharmacopeia (JP), European Pharmacopeia (EP), and US Pharmacopeia (USP) requirements. Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS is manufactured from raw materials that are non-GMO, and no irradiation is used in production process. No material of human or animal origin is used, including those derived from Transmissible Spongiform Encephalopathy relevant animal species; seed lots, cell banks, and routine fermentation are not used in the production process.

2.3 Specifications

The specifications for the food-grade product Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS, along with the specification methods, are listed in Table 2 below.

2.3.2 Residual Solvent Analysis

Acetic Acid (a Class 3 solvent) is the only solvent used in the manufacture of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS; residual solvent analysis indicates levels to be below 5000 ppm.

2.3.3 Heavy Metal Analysis

Heavy metals are not intentionally added or used in the manufacture of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®]. Shin-Etsu adheres to ICH Q3D guidelines for elemental impurities. Shin-Etsu defines “not likely present” as the combination of no intentional addition and confirmed values of less than the threshold of oral permitted daily exposure of Option 1, Table A.2.2 of the ICH Q3D guideline. Compliance is tested periodically using an inductively couple plasma analysis.

2.3.4 Shelf–Life Stability

A four-year stability study was conducted on Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS (AS-MF) at the Shin-Etsu Naoetsu plant in Niigata, Japan from 1993–1997. Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS was stored in its typical final packaging, a double-layer polyethylene bag within a 25 kg fiber drum. A control sample was stored in a 500 g polyethylene bag stored in a desiccator-containing silica gel. The temperature ranged from -3 °C in the winter to 43 °C in the summer and relative humidity ranged from 40–100%. The data in the table below demonstrate the stability of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS over 4 years.

2.4 Physical or Technical Effect

2.4.1 Technical Element

Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS is not intended to produce any physical or other technical effects that are relevant to the safety of the ingredient.

Part 3: Dietary Exposure

3.1 Intended Use

Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS, manufactured in accordance with current GMP, is intended to be used in dietary supplements as an enteric coating agent, carrier for solid dispersions, and an enteric agent in capsule shells at addition levels shown in Table 5 below, typically ranging from 5% to 80% of the final product weight. Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS is not intended for use in foods where standards of identity would preclude such use, infant formula, or any products that would require additional regulatory review by USDA.

^d Also includes gel caps, pills, soft gels, and vegi caps.

^e Concentration calculated using a 165 mg/capsule and assuming a typical 600 mg filled capsule weight.

3.2 Estimated Daily Intake (EDI)—Exposure

Exposure to Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS from the intended use categories was estimated for the U.S. population using dietary supplement consumption data from the What We Eat in America (WWEIA) dietary component of the National Health and Nutrition Examination Surveys (NHANES). The most recent dietary supplement data available at the time of this writing (2011–2012) were analyzed using Creme Food Safety software 3.6 (www.cremeglobal.com). These data were obtained from 7605 individuals who underwent two non-consecutive 24-hour dietary recall interviews (the first was collected in-person, the second by phone 3–10 days later).

WWEIA food (supplement) codes that were considered most similar to the intended use categories were utilized in the assessment and were assigned the relevant intended use concentrations. In this case, food codes for tablets (including caplets), capsules (including gel caps, pills, soft gels, and vegi caps), and granules were utilized. Note that no food codes for “pellets” were located.

Creme software is a probabilistic modeling tool that uses high-performance computing to predict intake (including total aggregate exposure) of food/supplement groups and/or individual dietary supplement ingredients. Creme Food Safety performs calculations using large-scale food consumption data sets. It bases the calculated estimates on each individual’s body weight from the survey, as opposed to averaged body weights. Calculations also incorporated the NHANES assigned sample weights for each individual in the survey, which measure the number of people in the population represented by that specific subject and help to ensure that the results statistically represent the entire U.S. population. Sample weights for NHANES participants incorporate adjustments for unequal selection probabilities and certain types of non-response, as well as an adjustment to independent estimates of population sizes for specific age, sex, and race/ethnicity categories. The data are shown for “consumers” (which includes only data from individuals who reported consuming one or more dietary supplement categories intended to contain the ingredient over the two-day survey period, as opposed to the whole population). Results are given as both absolute exposure (mg/day), as well as exposure relative to body weight (mg/kg bw/day).

The relative standard error (RSE; calculated by dividing the standard error of the estimate by the estimate itself and multiplying by 100) is a statistical criterion that can be used to determine the reliability of estimates as pertains to the population (the larger the RSE the less reliable the estimate).¹ RSE values greater than 25–30% are often considered reasonable cut-offs by which to consider a value unreliable.^{1,2} For the purpose of this safety assessment, an RSE value of greater than 25% was used to indicate that the estimated value was unreliable with regard to representing the population. RSE values are shown in the tables below for the 90th percentile values only, as the 90th percentile values are the most pertinent for the exposure estimates.

The Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS exposure estimates derived from the Creme assessment based on the intended use categories and concentrations are shown below in Tables 6 and 7.

According to the estimates in the tables above, approximately 43.4% of the U.S. total population (ages 2 and above) were identified as potential consumers of Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS from one or more of the proposed dietary supplement uses. The 90th percentile estimated exposure to Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS in the total population is 3200 mg/day (47.1 mg/kg bw/day). The highest potential consumer population at the 90th percentile on a relative to body weight basis is children (ages 2–12), at an estimated 52.6 mg/kg bw/day, although children also have the lowest absolute daily estimated exposure at 800 mg/day (although it should be noted that this 90th percentile data had a standard error that was high enough that the RSE calculation was greater than 25%; thus the data is not necessarily considered reliable for this population). The highest absolute daily estimated exposure is by adults ages 20 and older, at 3350 mg/day. These estimates are considered extremely conservative, as they assume that 100% of the intended use dietary supplement products in the market will contain the maximum intended use addition levels of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS. In reality, most dietary supplements do not require enteric coating or solid dispersions.

Part 4: Self-limiting Levels of Use

There are no known inherent self-limiting levels of use.

Part 5: Experience Based on Common Use in Food Prior to 1958

The GRAS conclusion for Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS is based on scientific procedures, and thus, experience based on common use in food prior to 1958 is not considered pivotal information.

Part 6: Narrative

6.1 Absorption, distribution, metabolism, and excretion (ADME)

6.1.1 Toxicokinetics of Hypromellose Acetate Succinate (HPMCAS)

Shin-Etsu sponsored a study (unpublished, 1984) to investigate mass balance and tissue distribution of their HPMCAS in Sprague-Dawley rats (Charles River CD strain). The test material was ¹⁴C radiolabeled at positions 1 and 4 of the succinyl moiety, which comprised 17% of the mass of the test material and administered to male and female rats by gavage (mass balance = 5 rat/sex, 1.0 g/kg bw, 5 μCi; tissue distribution = 20 rats/sex, 1.5 g/kg bw, 5 μCi). The purity of the test item was ≥95% (<5% impurity as ¹⁴C succinic acid). In the mass balance experiment, the rats were housed in metabolic cages and urine was collected at 3 and 6 hours, and daily thereafter for 5 days, following administration while feces were collected daily for 5 days (cage washings were also collected and analyzed at the end of the experiment). In the tissue distribution experiment, four animals of each sex were sacrificed at 3, 6, 24, 48, and 120 hours post-administration. Blood was collected under anesthesia just prior to sacrifice for analysis of whole blood and plasma, and brain, pituitary, thyroid, eyes, ovary/testis, salivary glands, thymus, heart, liver, uterus, kidney, lung, spleen, pancreas, adrenals, fat, muscle, and bone marrow were collected, processed, and analyzed.

The total (feces + cage washings + urine) cumulative mean recovery of radioactivity over five days following administration in the mass balance experiment was 96.5% (range, 91.4–104.4%) and 97.3% (range, 91.2–101.9%) of the dose for males and females, respectively. Cumulative mean fecal recovery of radioactivity following the dose was 94.4% (range, 87.5–104.1%) and 96.8% (range, 90.6–101.2%) for males and females, respectively, while cumulative mean urinary recoveries were 1.6% (range, 0.2–3.6%) of the dose in males and 0.4% (range, 0.2–0.5%) of the dose in females. Mean recoveries from terminal cage washings were 0.5% (range, 0.1–1.8%) of the dose in males and 0.1% (range, 0.0–0.2%) of dose in females. While total urinary radioactivity in most animals was ≤ 0.5% of the dose (the amount of succinyl impurity present in the ingredient), in two of five males, urinary excretion was 3.6% of the dose; this may be explained by a small amount of absorption of intact HPMCAS or by absorption of additional radiolabel following intermediate metabolism of HPMCAS by gut bacteria. The latter is more plausible as no more than 0.1 and 0.6% of the dose was recovered within the first 6 and 24 h, respectively, in any individual animal.

Blood and organ tissue samples taken from male and female animals showed no to trace amounts of radioactivity for up to 120 hours. The maximum amount of radioactivity observed was 0.2% of the dose which approximates the content of 0.5% of impurity in radiolabeled HPMCAS. Overall, data from the mass balance and tissue distribution experiments indicates that HPMCAS when administered orally to rats is poorly absorbed and then primarily excreted through the feces within 48 hours.

6.1.2 Toxicokinetics of Related Substances

Cellulose is a natural substance present in most diets as it is a major structural carbohydrate of green plants. Chemical processing is necessary to prepare it for use in food products.³ It is well accepted that modified celluloses in general are minimally absorbed and excreted almost exclusively in the feces after oral administration.⁴

Gorzinski et al. (1986) investigated the fate of ¹⁴C-HPMC in male and female Sprague-Dawley rats.⁵ In the first study, the animals (3/sex) were administered a single oral dose (via gavage) of 500 mg/kg bw and monitored for 72 hours in a glass metabolic chamber. Urine, feces, expired CO₂ and blood were sampled and analyzed throughout the 72-hour period at the end of which the rats were sacrificed. In a second investigation, the animals (3/sex) received 500 mg/kg bw/day of HPMC (via gavage) for five days. Rats were placed in glass metabolic chambers and urine, feces, expired CO₂ and blood were sampled and analyzed over course of 5 days; animals were sacrificed 24-hours after the last dose.

In the single dose and multiple dose studies, the average radioactivity eliminated through the feces was 100–105% and 97–102%, respectively, mostly eliminated within 24 hours. Radioactivity in the plasma was highest at 0.5 hours and decreased quickly over 6 hours. The estimated plasma half-life of ¹⁴C-HPMC was approximately 2 hours for male and female rats. In both studies there was negligible excretion from the urine, expired air and bile and negligible distribution into the carcass and tissues.

Another radiolabeled study conducted by Kitagawa (1974) on a similar compound, hydroxypropyl methylcellulose phthalate (HPMCP), revealed comparable results.⁶ ¹⁴C-HPMCP was orally administered (via gavage) to rats at a level of 1.3 g/kg and the rats were then placed in metabolic chambers. Following sacrifice, the concentration of radioactivity was determined in whole blood, plasma, tissues, urine and feces. In whole blood and plasma, the highest amount of radiolabeled HPMCP was found after 6 hours for males and after 2 hours for females. The radioactivity in tissues was low with unappreciable distribution of HPMCP found in all tissues except the liver and kidney. Even in these organs, the levels were extremely low, with the liver having the highest concentration of radioactivity at 0.02% and 0.03 % of the administered dose for male and female rats, respectively. The majority of radioactivity was found in the gastrointestinal tract, with 93.3% and 81.5% found after 6 hours in male and female rats, respectively. After 72 hours, 0.01% of the radioactivity was found in the gastrointestinal tract. Radioactivity was low in both bile and urine and the majority of radioactivity was found in the feces, up to 95% and 91% for male and female rats, respectively. This study supports the notion that modified cellulose compounds are minimally absorbed and eliminated via feces.

6.2 Toxicology Studies Conducted on HPMCAS

A battery of toxicological studies of Shin-Etsu's HPMCAS were conducted and by Hoshi et al., (1985).^{7 8 9 10 11} Included were acute (rats and rabbits), subchronic (rats), and chronic (rats) studies, as well as several reproductive and developmental toxicity studies conducted in two species (Sprague-Dawley rats and New Zealand White rabbits) that were carried out in accordance with the "Guidelines for Reproduction Experiments to Evaluate the Safety of Drugs" issued by the Ministry of Health & Welfare, Japanese Government in March 1975". Additionally, a more recent embryo-fetal development study in rats and rabbits was published to further evaluate the findings of Hoshi et al.¹² The studies by Hoshi et al. did not report whether they were conducted according to Good Laboratory Practices (GLP) or, with the exception of the reproductive and developmental studies, whether they followed OECD or other guidelines; some of the study protocols do not meet current internationally harmonized toxicological testing standards. However, they indicate a general lack of safety concern for HPMCAS ingestion at doses up to 2500 mg/kg bw/day, as might be expected from the above summary of unpublished toxicokinetic data for HPMCAS, indicating a lack of significant absorption. Summaries of these studies are reported in the subparts below.

6.2.1 Acute Toxicity

New Zealand White rabbits (5 males and 4 females per group) and Sprague-Dawley rats (5 controls/sex/group, 8 treated/sex/group) were administered 0 or 2.5g/kg bw HPMCAS once via gavage in an aqueous suspension of 0.25% carboxymethylcellulose (CMC) solution.¹¹ The animals were observed for behavioral changes for one week. The animals were then sacrificed, and the absolute weights and relative to body weights of the brain, heart, lungs, liver, submandibular gland (rats only), kidneys, testes, ovaries, spleen, pituitary, thyroid, adrenals, and thymus were recorded (thymus results were not reported).

No behavioral abnormalities were observed, and no deaths occurred. Except for an increased absolute brain weight in treated males, no statistically significant differences in absolute or relative organ weights compared to control were observed in rats. In rabbits, absolute right testes weight was statistically significantly increased in males, and absolute heart weight was significantly increased in females compared to the respective controls. There were no other changes in the absolute or relative weights organ weighs in rabbits. The LD₅₀ was determined to be greater than 2.5 g/kg bw.

6.2.2 Subchronic Repeated Dose Oral Toxicity (8-week)

In an 8-week study, male and female Sprague-Dawley rats were divided into 4 groups of 10 rats/sex/group and administered HPMCAS by gavage at 0 (control; 0.25% CMC solution only), 0.63, 1.25, and 2.5 g/kg bw/day six days per week.¹¹ Observations and examinations were conducted as follows in Table 8:

Table 8. Subchronic Oral Toxicity Study in Rats: Observations

Observations/Examinations
General observations/Mortality	Daily

Food consumption and water intake	Twice weekly
Hematological and biochemical analyses	Total protein, A/G ratio, alkaline phosphatase, aspartate aminotransferase, alanine aminotransferase, total cholesterol, urea nitrogen, glucose, white blood cell count, red blood cell count, hematocrit, hemoglobin, platelets
Urinalysis	Urine was collected using metabolic cages—evaluations consisted of urobilinogen, occult blood, ketone bodies, bilirubin, glucose, protein, and pH.
Absolute and relative organ weights	Brain, heart, lung, liver, submandibular gland, kidney, testis, ovaries, spleen, pituitary, thyroid, adrenal, thymus
Histopathological examination	Brain, heart, liver, intestines, kidney, spleen, lung, pancreas, adrenal glands, thyroid, testis, ovary, bone marrow.

No mortality or behavioral changes were observed throughout the study. The authors reported a non-significant trend towards decreased body weight gain in both sexes; no statistically significant differences were observed in food consumption (water intake results were not reported).

Various statistically significant changes were also found in hematological evaluations as shown in Table 9 below. Clinical chemistry results revealed a statistically significant decrease in total protein in mid-dose males, a statistically significant decrease in alkaline phosphatase high-dose males, and a statistically significant increase in urea nitrogen in mid-dose females. No statistically significant differences compared to controls were observed in urinalysis parameters.

All of the above statistically significant changes were considered relatively small in magnitude and/or were not dose-dependent and were without correlating histopathology with the possible exception of the decreased WBC count in low- and high-dose females which may be correlated with splenic hemosiderosis observed in these animals. As statistically significant decreases were not observed in RBC counts or platelet counts in female animals of these dose groups (L) and the authors did not perform WBC differentials, it is difficult to confirm this correlation.

Nonetheless, while the incidence of ‘+’ splenic hemosiderosis was greatest in the low- and high-dose females, the overall incidence (‘±’ and ‘+’ combined) of hemosiderosis was similar in control group females and splenic hemosiderosis also occurred in all male groups with lower incidence. Slight lymphocytic cell infiltration of Glisson’s capsule was observed histologically in 3 of 10 high-dose animals of both sexes. As this change was of a low degree and frequency and was also observed with similar frequency in control and high-dose animals in the chronic study described below, it was considered to be a spontaneous finding without toxicological relevance in this study. All other lesions observed during the histological examination occurred with similar frequencies among the groups, including the control group.

The observed changes in organ weights and clinical pathology were not considered toxicologically relevant effects of HPMCAS. No histopathological findings considered related to the test item were observed in the examined organs. In conclusion, while not determined by the authors, based on the evidence presented, the NOAEL in this study can be considered 2.5 g/kg bw/day of HPMCAS.

6.2.3 Chronic Repeated Dose Oral Toxicity (26-week)

In a 26-week study, male and female rats were divided into 3 groups of 10 rats/sex/group and administered 0 (control; 0.25% CMC solution), 1.25, or 2.5 g/kg bw/day of HPMCAS by gavage six days per week.¹¹ Observations and examinations were conducted as follows:

Table 12. Chronic Oral Toxicity Study in Rats: Observations

Observations/Examinations
General observations/Mortality	Daily
Body weights	Daily for 1 st month, then once weekly
Food consumption and water intake	Twice weekly
Hematological and biochemical analyses	13 th and 26 th weeks—Total protein, A/G ratio, alkaline phosphatase, aspartate aminotransferase, alanine aminotransferase total cholesterol, urea nitrogen, glucose, white blood cell count, red blood cell count, hematocrit, hemoglobin, platelets.
Urine analyses	Urine was collected using metabolic cages—evaluations consisted of urobilinogen, occult blood, ketone bodies, bilirubin, glucose, protein, and pH.
Absolute and relative organ weights	Brain, heart, lungs, liver, submandibular gland, kidneys, testis, ovaries, spleen, pituitary, thyroid, adrenal glands.
Histopathological examination	Heart, liver, kidney, spleen, lung, pancreas, adrenal gland, thyroid, stomach, testis, ovary, cerebrum, cerebellum, bone marrow.

The authors reported that “some of the rats died of pneumonia” although how many and in which groups was not reported, and there were there conflicting and incomplete reporting of related results as follows: the discussion section states that “no deaths ... were seen,” and the histopathology table reports findings of pneumonia in the lungs of only 2 of 10 control males but also shows that only nine high-dose males were examined histologically, yet no mention is made of the missing high-dose animal anywhere in the article.

No behavioral abnormalities were observed. A statistically significant decrease in body weight gain was reported in males of the high-dose group at 24 weeks; however, the change was transient and was not observed during previous weeks or at week 26. No statistically significant changes were found in food consumption or water intake.

Results of hematological and clinical chemistry examinations at week 13 were not reported; the following results relate to the week 26 examination. No statistically significant differences were observed in hematological or urinalysis parameters when compared to controls. Clinical chemistry analyses indicated a statistically significant increase in alkaline phosphatase in the low-dose group males and a statistically significant increase in the albumin/globulin ratio in the low- and high-dose group in males. In female rats, findings were statistically significant decreases in lactose dehydrogenase and alkaline phosphatase in the high-dose group; note, decreases in these enzymes are generally in the direction opposite of concern. The statistically significant biochemical indices at week 26 were small and were not dose-related, and no correlating findings were noted upon microscopic examination of tissues; therefore, they were not considered toxicologically relevant.

A statistically significant increase in absolute left thyroid weight in the males in the low-dose group and a statistically significant increase in absolute right thyroid weight in the males in the high-dose group were observed. Absolute right adrenal weights in males in the low- and high-dose groups were also statistically significantly increased, although not dose-dependently. In males, various statistically significant changes in the mean organ weight relative to body weight ratios were recorded (see table below), but no correlating histopathology was observed in these organs. No statistically significant changes were found in absolute or relative organ weights in the female animals.

Histological lesions observed were similar to those observed in the subchronic study and occurred with similar frequencies among the groups, including cellular infiltration of Glisson's capsule (2 of 10 control females, 2 of 10 low-dose females, and 1 of 9 control males). HPMCAS was determined to be non-toxic at these doses. Based on the reported evidence, we consider the NOAEL to be 2.5 g/kg bw/day.

6.2.4 Fertility Study in Rats

In a study focused on the effects of HPMCAS on fertility, reproductive function, and early embryonic development, male Sprague-Dawley rats (25/group) were administered HPMCAS daily beginning 60 days before pairing and continuing until completion of mating, and female rats (25/group) were administered HPMCAS from 14 days prior to mating up to day 7 of gestation.⁹ Both sexes were administered HPMCAS via gavage at 625, 1250 or 2500 mg/kg bw/day suspended in 0.25% CMC solution. Control animals were given CMC solution alone. Males were sacrificed and subjected to necropsy at completion of mating; dams were sacrificed on day 21 of gestation, and all fetuses were examined. Observations and examinations were conducted as follows:

Table 14. Fertility Study in Rats: Observations

Observations/Examinations
General observations/Mortality	During pre-mating, mating, and gestation periods.
Body weights	Twice weekly during pre-mating and mating; dams daily during gestation period
Food consumption and water intake	Twice weekly
Necropsy of males	Gross pathological examinations were conducted, and testes weights were obtained.
Necropsy of dams	Gross pathological examinations were conducted.
Fertility parameters	Number of corpora lutea, implantation sites, viable and dead fetuses, and resorbed embryos were counted, and positions of implantations were observed. Fetal body weights and placenta weights were measured, and fetal sex was recorded. Pre- and post-implantation loss was calculated.
Fetal examination*	All fetuses were subjected to external examination. Approximately two-thirds of viable fetuses per litter were randomly selected for skeletal examination, and visceral examinations were conducted on the remaining fetuses.

*Because dosing did not cover the period of organogenesis, susceptibility to test item effects on fetal development is expected to low.

No abnormalities were noted in the general condition of animals, and no deaths occurred during the study in either sex. A few slight, but statistically significant changes, in body weight, food consumption, or water consumption were observed transiently in male or female animals but overall body weight development was not affected. No gross pathological changes related to treatment were observed in male or female animals at the respective necropsies. A single neoplasm (not described) was detected in one dam from the high-dose group and was considered an individual finding. The absolute left testes weight was slightly, but statistically significantly, increased in the high-dose males; however, total testicular weight compared to controls was unaffected.

A few statistically significant changes in fertility parameters (see Table 15) were observed and considered to be without toxicological or biological significance. The number of pregnant females, copulation and pregnancy rates, pre- and post-implantation losses, and sex ratios were similar among the groups.

The authors also conducted and reported results of fetal external, skeletal, and visceral examinations. Clubfoot was observed in one low-dose and four high-dose fetuses, and a short tail was observed in one of the high-dose cases. Skeletal variations (i.e., supernumerary ribs, asymmetry of sternbrae, deformations of the vertebral body) were observed at low frequencies and without statistically significant differences in treated versus control groups while skeletal malformations were observed in one fetus each of the control (shortening of ribs), low- (shortening of ribs), and mid- (fission of thoracic vertebral centra) dose groups and in eight fetuses of the high-dose group (fission of thoracic vertebral centra x 4, lack of thoracic, lumbar, sacral, and caudal vertebra x 1, lack of ribs x 1, deformation of ribs x 1, and shortening of ribs x 3). It is unclear from the reporting whether the high-dose changes were statistically significant. Visceral malformations observed were pyelectasis in one control and three mid-dose fetuses, and dilatation of the cerebral ventricle was observed in two mid-dose fetuses. The authors considered the external, skeletal, and visceral observations as “physiological variation” common to the rat strain used but did not present historical control data. Additionally, the dams were not dosed during the period of organogenesis; thus, it is unlikely that development of the limbs, skeleton, kidneys, and brain were susceptible to a teratogenic effect during this study.

The NOAEL was determined as 2500 mg/kg bw/day HPMCAS for paternal and maternal toxicity and reproductive performance.

6.2.5 Embryo-fetal Developmental Toxicity Study with Extended Evaluation in Rats

In a another study, pregnant female rats were administered HPMCAS from gestation day (GD) 7 to GD 17 in order to investigate the potential for developmental toxicity of the test item during the period of organogenesis.⁷ The animals (40+/group) were administrated HPMCAS in 0.25% CMC at 0, 625, 1250 and 2500 mg/kg bw/day by gavage. On GD 21, two-thirds of the pregnant females (27 to 30/group) were anesthetized and fetuses were delivered by cesarean section. The remaining one-third of dams were allowed to deliver spontaneously, and the growth, development, and reproductive ability of the F1 offspring were evaluated. F1 pups were culled to 10 pups/litter on postnatal day (PND) 7. Approximately, 12–15 (based on ‘n’s reported in data tables) F1 pups/sex/group were sacrificed and subjected to necropsy at weaning (interim sacrifice). Of the remaining pups, one male and one non-litter mate female from each litter were mated within groups at 11 weeks of age, and F2 fetuses were examined at the scheduled sacrifice on GD 21. Examinations were conducted as follows:

-----------------------------	---

No deaths occurred and no abnormal behavior was observed in F0 dams. There were no statistically significant effects on body weight development of the F0 dams, and no abnormalities were observed before or during parturition in the dams that were carried through to spontaneous delivery. In the F0 dams sacrificed on GD 21, no statistically significant differences were observed in numbers of corpora lutea or implantation sites.

No statistically significant differences among the groups were observed in dead and live fetuses, early or late resorptions, pre- or post-implantation losses, mean litter weights, sex ratios, or mean body weights of the fetuses. Mean placental weight was statistically significantly decreased compared to controls in the low- and high-dose groups. In the F1 fetuses, clubfoot was observed externally in all groups and increased in incidence dose-dependently (controls, 3/377; low-dose, 8/376; mid-dose, 9/347; high-dose, 16/386); however, the increases were not statistically significant compared to the concurrent control group. Short tail was observed in two mid-dose fetuses. Pyelectasis was observed with similar frequency in all groups during the visceral examination. Various skeletal variations were observed with similar frequencies among the groups although on evaluation of rate of ossification, a statistically significant decrease in the mean number of sternal vertebral centra was observed in fetuses of the high-dose group dams compared to controls. No skeletal malformations were observed in the high-dose group fetuses while in the control and lower dose groups several malformations were observed in individual fetuses as follows: fission of the thoracic vertebral centra (1 low-dose), synostosis of sternbrae (1 low-dose), and shortening of ribs (1 control and 1 mid-dose).

The mean gestation period of F0 dams that delivered spontaneously was statistically significantly longer in the low dose group (22.1 days) compared to controls (21.6 days). The authors reported that the increase was “within a normal range of gestation period,” which also agrees with general literature values.¹³ No statistically significant differences compared to controls in delivery rate, viability index, sex ratios, or nursing rate were observed.

No external alterations or statistically significant differences in mean body weight or body weight gain, food consumption and water intake, developmental markers, or functional development were observed during the lactation period in the F1 pups. At the interim sacrifice, a few statistically significant changes were observed in absolute and relative organ weights but were not dose related. Except for a single control female, no skeletal malformations were observed in the F1 pups, and with respect to the state of ossification, no significant differences in number of caudal vertebrae were observed.

No significant differences in estrous cycle lengths were observed in F1 females. The copulation rate was 100% in all mated groups, and pregnancy rates were 95, 90, 100, and 85% in the control, low-, mid-, and high-dose group females, respectively. Food consumption and water intake were statistically significantly decreased compared to controls in F1 dams during the gestation period, but the decreases were not dose related, and body weight gain was not affected.

The numbers of corpora lutea and implantation sites and mean litter weights of the high-dose F1 dams were statistically significantly increased compared to controls. No significant differences in treated groups compared to controls were observed in early or late resorptions, pre- or post-implantation losses, total live and dead fetuses, sex ratios, or mean fetal weights. Mean placental weights of the low- and mid-dose dams were statistically significantly increased compared to controls.

Clubfoot was observed in one control and one high-dose F2 fetus on external examination, and pyelectasis was observed in two mid-dose fetuses during the visceral examination. Incidence of fetuses exhibiting skeletal variations did not differ statistically between the groups, and a skeletal malformation (fusion of thoracic vertebral centra) was observed in one low- and one-high dose fetus.

The authors concluded that the dose-dependent increase in incidence of clubfoot observed in F1 fetuses was not related to the test item due to lack of statistical significance and the results of the unpublished toxicokinetic study reported in Subpart 6.1.1 above demonstrating that HPMCAS is not significantly absorbed. While the authors did not report historical data, the toxicokinetic data support the conclusion, and it is further supported by presence of the alteration in control animals (albeit at lower incidence), the lack of an associated underlying skeletal defect in fetuses subjected to skeletal examination, the lack of occurrence of clubfoot in F1 pups delivered spontaneously, and the high incidence compared to the background occurrence rates reported in the literature (see further discussion at Subpart 6.2.8). Therefore, the NOAELs for maternal and developmental toxicity of HPMCAS in Sprague-Dawley rats were determined as 2500 mg/kg bw/day.

6.2.6 Embryo-fetal Developmental Toxicity Study in Rabbits

Four groups of 12–13 pregnant New Zealand White rabbits were administered 0, 625, 1250 or 2500 mg/kg bw/day of HPMCAS via gavage on GDs 6–18.⁸ The vehicle-control was 0.25% CMC. All dams were sacrificed on GD 29 by air embolism, and fetuses were extracted by cesarean section and examined. Detailed examinations were conducted as follows:

Table 17. EFD Study in Rabbits: Observations, Hoshi et al., 1985

Observations/Examinations
Maternal parameters	Behavior; food and water consumption; body weight; gross pathological examination; placenta weight; and number of corpora lutea, resorption sites, and implantation sites.
Fetal survival	Number and distribution of viable and dead fetuses; live fetuses were placed in temperature- and humidity-controlled box for examining the survival ability at 6 and 24 h.
Fetal growth	Individual fetal body weights and sex.
Fetal morphology	Thoracic and abdominal organs examined for position, color, and form. 1/3 of viable fetuses processed for visceral examination and 2/3 processed for skeletal examination.

No deaths, abortions, or abnormal behaviors were observed. Slight variations in maternal body weights were observed during the dosing period but were not reported as statistically significant, and weight gain from the end of treatment to termination was reported as steadily increasing although, graphically, body weights in the mid- and high-dose groups were slightly lower than those of the control and low-dose groups from GD 13 through 29, but body weights were well within $\pm 10\%$ of the control group in all treated groups throughout the study. The authors reported that mean food consumption and water intake of the treated groups were similar to those of the control group, except between GD 12 and 13 in the low-dose group. Based on the body weight graph, the variation in food consumption and water intake in the low-dose group did not adversely affect body weight development, and, in fact, the mean body weight of the low-dose group, which had varied slightly below mean control body weight from GD 7–12, caught up to the control group on GD 13 and remained very close throughout the remainder of the study.

No statistically significant differences were observed between groups in numbers of corpora lutea or implantations, early or late resorptions, pre- and post-implantation losses, live or dead fetuses, fetal viability at 6 or 24 h, sex ratio, or mean litter, placental, or individual male and female fetal weights. The single dead fetus observed occurred in the control group. No external or visceral malformations were observed in any groups. Skeletal variations (asymmetry of sternbrae) and malformations (synostosis of ribs and bifurcation of ribs) were observed in only one fetus of the high-dose group, and no statistically significant differences were noted in the state of ossifications among the groups. The NOAELs for maternal and developmental toxicity were determined as 2500 mg/kg bw/day HPMCAS in New Zealand White rabbits.

6.2.7 Peri- and Postnatal Developmental Toxicity Study with Extended Evaluation in Rats

Lastly, Hoshi et al., conducted a peri- and postnatal study in which 20+ pregnant female Sprague-Dawley rats/group were administered 0, 625, 1250, and 2500 mg/kg bw/day HPMCAS by gavage from GD 17 through PND 21; the vehicle-control was 0.25% CMC.¹⁰ All dams were allowed to deliver spontaneously and rear their young, and litters were culled to 10 pups on PND 7. Dams were sacrificed and necropsied following weaning on PND 21. Evaluations were extended in order to examine the effects of exposure during the perinatal period (and possibly via nursing during the postnatal period) on reproductive ability of the F1 generation. Male and female offspring of each F0 dam dose group were evaluated as follows: Forty pups/sex/group (F1a) were subjected to sacrifice and necropsy following weaning (PND 21) while an additional 10 pups/sex/group (F1b) were followed through postnatal week (PNW) 11, and 25 pups/sex/group (F1c) were mated, and five dams of each group were sacrificed and their fetuses examined on GD21 while the remaining dams were allowed to go through gestation, deliver spontaneously, and rear their pups. The development of the F2 pups was observed until weaning.

No deaths, remarkable effects, or abnormal behavior were observed in the F0 dams. No statistically significant changes in body weight were observed between the control and treated group dams. A statistically significant decrease in food consumption was noted in late pregnancy in the mid- and high-dose dams, but no effect was observed on body weight gain; no other effects on food consumption or water intake were observed during the gestation or nursing periods.

Administration of HPMCAS to F0 dams during the perinatal period did not result in statistically significant differences in gestation length, implantations, numbers of still and live born pups, sex ratio, delivery rate, or viability index, and no external abnormalities were observed in any F1 pups at birth. Administration of HPMCAS to F0 dams during the perinatal and lactation periods did not affect nursing rate or body weight development of the F1 pups. Separation of the pinna and eruption of lower incisors was statistically significantly delayed in F1 pups compared to controls; the authors reported that the delays were “within a normal range.” No other statistically significant differences in developmental parameters were observed in the F1 pups.

Following necropsy of the F1a pups, observed incidences of skeletal variations and malformations were similar among the groups. With respect to state of ossification, a slight, statistically significant decrease in number of caudal vertebrae was observed dose-dependently in male F1a pups of the high-dose F0 dams; no effect was observed when considering number of caudal vertebrae in male and female pups combined.

A statistically significant dose-related increase compared to controls in absolute liver weight was observed in male F1a pups of the high-dose group F0 dams, and increased liver weight relative to body weight was also dose-dependently statistically significantly increased in the mid- and high-dose male pups and high-dose female pups. In the F1a females, absolute liver weights were not statistically increased compared to controls, but a trend towards a dose relationship was noted. Left and total kidney weights relative to bodyweight were also statistically significantly dose-dependently increased in the high-dose F1a males and left kidney weight relative to bodyweight was statistically significantly increased in F1a females. Statistically significant dose-related decreases in absolute and relative right ovary weights were observed in high-dose female F1a pups. Thymus weight relative to bodyweight was statistically significantly dose-dependently increased in high-dose females. Other statistically significant alterations in absolute and relative organ weights compared to controls were decreased absolute left and total testes weights and relative left, right, and total testes weights in low-dose males; decreased absolute and relative heart weights in mid-dose females; and increased relative lung weight in mid- and high-dose females. The authors reported, without further explanation, that the observed changes in organ weights were without toxicological concern. Because the authors did not comment on or provide historical control data or conduct histological examinations of the weighted organs, it is difficult to comment on the observed organ weight alterations based purely on the objective data. The short dosing period during the gestation phase in the F0 dams did not cover the period of organogenesis but did cover histogenesis. Due to the negligible oral absorption of HPMCAS observed in the unpublished toxicokinetic study described in Subpart 6.1.1, it is further unlikely that fetuses would have been exposed in utero or that the pups would have been exposed via nursing; for both of which to occur, additional membrane transport would have been necessary. For this reason, and in the absence of maternal toxicity, we find it unlikely that these changes were attributable to the test item. The statistically significant changes in absolute and relative organ weights in the F1a pups are shown in Tables 19–21 below.

Following weaning, there were no statistically significant differences in body weights or body weight gains of F1b pups from PNW 4 through 11 although the authors reported food consumption and water intake were statistically significantly decreased in groups of pups of the treated F0 dams compared to controls over the period. The authors also reported that the deviations were “considered within a normal ranges.” Based on the graphs it is unclear whether the authors’ statement concerning food and water consumption was with respect to all dose groups, both sexes, and/or over which specific weeks. For example, only in the graph for water intake in male F1b pups was the control curve clearly above the other dose groups from PNW 5–11 while in females, the control curve was clearly below the dose group control curves from PNW 8–11. In the food consumption graphs all group curves are very close together throughout the entire period, and the resolution of the graph impedes discerning exactly when the various dose curves crossed one another; in both sexes, the control curves appear to be slightly above or slightly below some or all of the other dose curves at various time points. Despite the above confusion, the slight alterations in food and water consumption did not affect body weight development and, therefore, we consider them to be without toxicological relevance. With the exception of an increased bar holding time in the chinning test in high-dose female F1b pups, no statistically significant differences were observed in functional developmental parameters in the F1b pups.

No statistically significant differences in bodyweight gain, food consumption, or water intake during gestation or in copulation or pregnancy rates of the F1c dams were observed. There were no statistically significant differences in frequency of external, visceral, or skeletal malformations or skeletal variations in F2 fetuses delivered by cesarean section although a trend towards a dose-dependent increase was observed for pyelectasis. With respect to the state of ossification, statistically significant increases were observed in the mid- and high-dose groups in only one (number of proximal phalanges in the hindpaw) of the 11 markers evaluated. The authors reported that no developmental abnormalities or effects on locomotor ability were observed from birth through weaning in the F2 pups of F1 dams allowed to deliver spontaneously; however, the authors did not report any data or describe specific evaluations conducted on these pups.

Due to inadequate or incomplete reporting of methods and data, it is difficult to draw definitive conclusions with respect to the several statistically significant and dose related alterations observed in this study. Indeed, the authors themselves were less than definitive in their concluding remarks. Nonetheless, based on the totality of evidence from the three additional developmental and reproductive toxicity studies conducted by Hoshi et al. and the study by Cappon et al. described below (albeit, these additional studies were conducted during different dosing windows), the short period of in utero dosing in the current study, and the likelihood, based on toxicokinetic data, that exposure of dams and pups to HPMCAS in the current study was negligible, the results observed are considered unlikely to represent a toxicological concern.

6.2.8 Embryo-fetal Developmental Toxicity Study in Rats and Rabbits

In order to further evaluate the potential developmental toxicity of HPMCAS, Cappon et al. (2003) administered doses of 0, 50, 150, 625, and 2500 mg/kg bw/day HPMCAS to groups of approximately 20 pregnant Sprague-Dawley rats and New Zealand White rabbits during the respective periods of organogenesis.¹² The lower doses were prepared as suspensions in 0.5% methylcellulose, which was also used as the vehicle-control, while the high-dose was prepared as a suspension in 1% methylcellulose. The test solutions were administered by gavage to rats (19–20/group) once daily from GD 6–17 and to rabbits (18–20/group) twice daily, at a 6 h interval, from GD 7–19. The study was conducted in accordance with International Conference on Harmonization (1994): Guideline on detection of toxicity to reproduction for medicinal products (Federal Register 59:48746–48752) in order to 1) further investigate the dose-related increase in frequency of clubfoot observed in external fetal examinations in the rat embryo-fetal developmental toxicity (EFD) study by Hoshi et al. (1985) and 2) because the number of litters investigated in the rabbit EFD study by Hoshi et al. (1985) “was not consistent with current regulatory requirement.” The rat and rabbit dams were sacrificed on GD 21 and 29, respectively, and maternal and fetal examinations were carried out. Observations and examinations were conducted as follows:

Table 22. EFD Study: Observations in Rats and Rabbits, Cappon et. al., 2003

Observations/Examinations
Maternal
Morbidity and mortality	At least twice daily.
Body weight and food consumption	Daily beginning on gestation day 5 or 6.
Necropsy	Gross pathology, gravid uterine weight, number of corpora lutea, and number, type and location of implantation sites.
Fetuses
C-section	Number of viable fetuses, sex ratio, and fetal weight.
External and visceral development	All rats and rabbits.
Skeletal development	All rabbits and 50% rats.

With the exception of a transient increase in bodyweight gain in low-mid-dose rabbit dams between GD 7 and 13, no statistically significant changes were observed in maternal bodyweights, bodyweight gains or food consumption in treated rats or rabbits compared to controls. No statistically significant differences were observed in numbers of pregnant animals, gravid uterine weights, numbers of corpora lutea or implantation sites, early or late resorptions, pre- or post-implantation losses, or number of viable fetuses in either rats or rabbits. Rat fetal weight was statistically significantly increased (mostly due to the male contribution according to the authors) in the high-dose group compared to controls; the increase was dose-related but remained within the normal range of published historical control data of the breeder (Charles River Laboratories), and was, therefore, considered due to normal biological variation. Additionally, in rabbits, a statistically significant increase in fetal weight was noted in the low-dose group and was also considered normal biological variation. No statistically significant differences compared to controls were observed in external, visceral, or skeletal malformations and variations in rat or rabbit fetuses. In the rat fetuses no skeletal malformations or skeletal limb variations were observed, and in the rabbit fetuses none of the observed skeletal malformations involved limbs. The incidences of observed skeletal malformations and variations in rats and rabbits were all within the historical normal ranges of the breeder.

The authors concluded that the dose-related increase in clubfoot observed in rat fetuses by Hoshi et al. (1985) was not related to treatment with HPMCAS. The authors further suggested that the findings observed by Hoshi et al. may have been due to misdiagnosis or an artifact of the cesarean section or examination procedures citing the following evidence: 1) the incidence of clubfoot in Sprague-Dawley rat historical control data published by Charles River Laboratories is 0.001% and the incidence of clubfoot in Sprague-Dawley rat historical control data from Japan published by Morita et al. (1987) is 0.006% while the incidence in the EFD study in rats by Hoshi et al. was much higher, even in control animals (0.80%), 2) in the EFD study in rats by Hoshi et al. clubfoot was observed only in fetuses harvested on GD 21 and was not observed in the pups that were spontaneously delivered by dams of the same dose groups, 3) the external diagnosis of clubfoot by Hoshi et al. in the EFD study in rats did not have an underlying skeletal finding, 4) clubfoot was observed in low- and high-dose fetuses in the rat fertility study by Hoshi et al. (1985) in which dosing was terminated on GD 7 (prior to the period of limb development), 5) not all presentations of clubfoot in rats are malformations, and the term is no longer preferred in such cases. Based on the reported results, we agree with the authors' conclusion that HPMCAS was not teratogenic in rats or rabbits and further conclude that the NOAELs for maternal and developmental toxicity were 2500 mg/kg bw/day in Sprague-Dawley rats and New Zealand White rabbits.

6.3 Toxicological Studies on HPMC

In 2007, Burdock published a review that covered older studies, as well as more recent toxicological data on HPMC, including acute (rats), subacute (rats, rabbits and dogs), chronic (2-year) (rats) and teratogenicity/reproduction toxicological studies (rats).⁴ The majority of these studies were devoid of any adverse effects. However, administration of extremely high doses of HPMC (10–30 g/kg bw/day; up to 30% of diet) resulted in growth retardation and anemia in a few of the studies. Because there was no tissue-specific toxicity noted, these findings were attributed to the anti-nutrient effects of HPMC and undernourishment of the animals rather than any direct toxic effects of the test item. HPMC was concluded to be “extremely low in chronic oral toxicity”.

Most recently, Thackaberry et al. (2010) investigated the safety and tolerability of HPMC along with other compounds, for use as a vehicle in general toxicology studies.¹⁴ HPMC was administered via gavage at 20 mg/kg bw/day to mice, rats, dogs, and cynomolgus monkeys for approximately 90 days. Clinical observations, body weights, food consumption parameters, clinical pathology, and histopathological examinations were performed. The suitability of HPMC for use as a vehicle substance (e.g., a compound without biological effects) was confirmed with a lack of toxicological effects on all parameters examined.

6.4 Additional Scientific Studies

6.4.1 Studies on HPMCAS in Laboratory Animals

As summarized in the table below, Hoshi et al., conducted additional investigations using different methodologies in various species (mice, rats, guinea pigs, dogs, and frogs) to evaluate the effects of Shin-Etsu HPMCAS when dosed intraperitoneally and orally.¹⁵ There were no significant adverse effects on the central and autonomic nervous systems, cardiovascular (respiration, blood pressure, and heart rate) or digestive systems, and Shin-Etsu HPMCAS also had no effect on hemolysis, coagulation, or urine parameters (see Table 23). All investigations were included in one publication with minimal details regarding methods.

Table 23. Additional evaluations of Shin-Etsu HPMCAS

Animal Species and number of HPMCAS treated animals	Body System	Test item dose (single dose unless otherwise specified)	Examinations	Results
Central Nervous System
Dogs, Beagle, male (CSK Co. Ltd.) (n=6; control and treated not specified)	General behavior	250 mg/kg bw orally	Behavior was observed for 6 hours after administration and also at 24 hours.	No significant changes in behavior were observed.
Rats, Sprague-Dawley male (Charles River Japan Inc.) (n=26)	Rectal temperature	125 and 250 mg/kg bw orally	Rectal temperature was measured before administration, and at 20, 60, 120 and 240 minutes after the administration using an electric thermistor.	Test item significantly increased the rectal temperature of rats 20 minutes after administration of 250 mg/kg bw and at 125 mg/kg bw from hours 1-4. No clear dose-dependent response was found.
Rats, Sprague-Dawley male (Charles River Japan Inc.) (n=16)	Motor coordination (rotarod method)	250 mg/kg bw orally	Motor coordination was measured at 30 and 60 minutes after oral administration of test item. Falling down from the rotarod within 5 minutes was judged as loss of motor coordination.	No significant change was observed in motor coordination.
Autonomic Nervous system
Mice, male, ICR strain (CLEA Japan Co. Ltd.) (n=20)	Effect on pupillary diameter	0.75 and 1.5 g/kg injected subcutaneously	Test item was injected subcutaneously and the right and left pupillary diameters were measured 5, 15, 30 and 60 minutes later.	No mydriatic action was observed.
Guinea pigs, male, Hartley, (Ichikawaya) (n=10)	Anti-sialagogic action	125 and 250 mg/kg bw orally	Test item was administered 30 minutes prior to the subcutaneous administration of pilocarpine (10 mg/kg bw). Immediately after the administration of pilocarpine, the animals were restrained in Bowman cages in a prone position and the volume of saliva collected was determined during 2 hours.	Test item tended to suppress sialagogic action in the first hour at oral doses of 125 and 250 mg/kg. However, both dosages increased the volume of saliva over a 2-hour period.
Guinea pigs, male, Hartley, (Ichikawaya)	Effect on isolated smooth muscle	N/A	The ileum of the deceased animals was isolated and suspended in an organ bath	No significant effect on the contraction of isolated ileum.

(n=not clear, "groups of 4-5")			filled with Tyrode's solution. Contractions of the preparations were isotonicly recorded on a kymograph.
Rats, female, Sprague-Dawley (Charles River Japan Inc.) (n=not clear, "groups of 4-5")	Effect on contraction of isolated uterus.	N/A	The uterus horn was isolated from deceased animals and suspended in an organ bath filled with Tyrode's solution. Contractions of the preparation were isotonicly recorded on a kymograph.	No significant effect on the contraction of isolated uterus.
Cardiovascular system
Dogs, Beagle, male (CSK Co. Ltd.) (n=not clear, "groups of 4-6")	Effect on respiration, blood pressure, heart rate and ECG	N/A	Animals were anesthetized and respiration via a tracheal cannula, blood pressure via the carotid artery and heart rate were simultaneously recorded on a cardiograph. Blood flow in the femoral artery was measured with a blood flow meter. The test item was injected into the femoral artery at a constant speed of 0.4 mL/10 sec.	No significant changes were observed in blood pressure or respiration rate immediately or after 30 or 60 minutes after test item administration. No significant effect of HPMCAS on actions of histamine, noradrenaline, serotonin, adrenaline, isoproterenol or acetylcholine. No changes were found in the ECG pattern of dogs and no influence on femoral artery blood flow was noted.
Digestive organs
Mice, male, ICR strain (CLEA Japan Co. Ltd.) (n=29)	Effect on transportation of BaSO ₄ in small intestine	1.25 and 2.5 g/kg bw orally	Test item was administered and 20 minutes later 0.2 mL of 50% BaSO ₄ was administered and after another 20 minutes the animals were sacrificed and the whole intestines were removed. Mobility ratio (%) was calculated as distance of BaSO ₄ transportation divided by the whole length of small intestine x 100	Oral administration of HPMCAS to mice tended to suppress the transportation of BaSO ₄ , but this was non-significant.
Rats, Sprague-Dawley male (Charles River Japan Inc.) (n=12)	Effect on gastric secretion	N/A	Animals were anesthetized and the abdomen was opened and pylorus ligated. The test compound was injected into the duodenum at doses of 62.5 and 125 mg/kg bw. The abdomen was closed and then four hours later, the stomach	Intra-duodenal administration of HPMCAS suppressed the volume and slightly acidified the gastric juice and output of pepsin per 1 hour was slightly

6.4.2 Human Studies

Three clinical trials, two of which included HPMCAS as a suspension aid and dispersant for drug formulations at a concentration of 1% by weight^{16, 17} and one in which a suspension of HPMCAS powder was used as a placebo (dose not specified)¹⁸ were located on clinicaltrials.gov. The use of HPMCAS in this manner supports general recognition of its safety for ingestion by humans.

6.5 Authoritative Safety Opinions

6.5.1 European Food Safety Authority

The European Food Safety Authority (EFSA) re-evaluated many types of modified celluloses (including microcrystalline cellulose, powdered cellulose, methyl cellulose, ethyl cellulose, hydroxypropyl cellulose, hydroxypropyl methyl cellulose, ethyl methyl cellulose, sodium carboxy methyl cellulose and enzymatically hydrolyzed carboxy methyl cellulose) as food additives (note, the substance that is the subject of this GRAS notice—HPMCAS—is not on this list).¹⁹ An acceptable daily intake (ADI) was not specified for unmodified and modified celluloses as they are not absorbed and are excreted intact in the feces. They can as well be fermented by intestinal flora in animals and humans. Because of structural, physicochemical and biological similarities, the panel considered it possible to read-across between all the celluloses. Acute toxicity is low and there is no geno-toxic concern. Short-term and subchronic dietary toxicity studies performed at levels up to 10% did not indicate specific treatment-related adverse effects. Chronic studies resulted in NOAELs reported up to 9,000 mg/kg bw/day. No carcinogenic properties were detected, and there were no observed effects on reproductive performance or developmental effects at doses greater than 1,000 mg/kg bw by gavage. Combined exposure to celluloses at the 95th percentile was up to 506 mg/kg bw daily. The panel concluded there was no need for an ADI, and there was no safety concern for reported uses and use levels.

6.5.2 World Health Organization

In 1989, the Joint FAO/WHO Expert Committee on Food Additives (JECFA) re-evaluated their previously established (1974) group ADI for modified celluloses of up to 25 mg/kg bw/day (as a sum of total modified celluloses), which was based on the highest “no-effect level” (NEL) obtainable in lifespan studies without causing nutritional effects and using a safety factor of 100.²⁰ It was suggested by the Committee that this ADI could be exceeded for “dietetic purposes” (e.g., a situation where use is primarily intended to take advantage of the non-caloric property of these additives). Seven modified celluloses, ethyl cellulose, hydroxypropyl cellulose, HPMC, methyl ethyl cellulose, sodium carboxymethyl cellulose, ethyl cellulose and ethyl hydroxyethylcellulose were re-evaluated in order to include the “most recent information on technology and toxicology”. After a review of available data on modified celluloses as a group, including human data indicating no adverse effects (specifically no significant clinical laxative effects) upon ingestion of up to 30 g/day/person, the Committee concluded that “the establishment of an acceptable daily intake (ADI) expressed in numerical form is not deemed necessary” and, therefore, allocated an ADI “not specified” to the seven modified celluloses.²⁰

6.6 Allergenicity

Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS does not contain or have added, and is manufactured in a facility free of, all eight major allergens (milk, egg, fish, Crustacean shellfish, tree nuts, wheat, peanuts, and soybeans) identified, and required to be disclosed in labeling, in the Food Allergen Labeling and Consumer Protection Act (FALCPA). Additionally, Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS does not contain gluten, celery, mustard, sesame seeds, sulfur dioxide and sulfites or any derivatives or products of the aforementioned.

6.7 History of Consumption

HPMC has been utilized as a food additive, specifically as an emulsifier, stabilizer, thickener, and gelling agent, as well as an ingredient for film coatings for pharmaceutical tablets for over 50 years, and its pharmacological and biochemical effects have been studied extensively.²¹⁻⁴ Due to its chemical nature as a high-viscosity, non-digestible polysaccharide, it has also been studied and used as a dietary fiber. HPMCAS is known to have a pH-dependent solubility and an inhibitory effect on re-crystallization of drugs from super-saturated drug solution, positioning it as a superior enteric film coating ingredient and solid dispersion carrier. Both HPMC and HPMCAS are listed in the FDA inactive ingredient database and are subjects of USP/NF and JP monographs.

Modified celluloses, aka “cellulose derivatives”, or “cellulosics” are vastly important to the pharmaceutical industry. In one report, over 600 prescription drug products were found that included modified cellulose ingredients, approximately 71% in tablet form, 20% in capsules and oral liquids, and the remaining found in injectable, nasal, ophthalmic, topical, transdermal, implant and buccal forms. HPMC was found to be the most frequently used modified cellulose, found in approximately 62% of all dosage forms, while HPMCAS was found primarily in enteric coatings and delayed release dosage forms.²²

6.8 Adverse Events

Shin-Etsu states that no adverse event reports associated with the consumption of this ingredient to date have been received by the company.

No FDA letters regarding concern for safety to companies that market products containing HPMCAS were located. A search of FDA's Recalls, Market Withdrawals, & Safety Alerts search engine, and FDA's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition Adverse Event Reporting System did not uncover any mention of HPMCAS products. All databases were accessed on June 15, 2020.

6.9 Current Regulatory Status

A thorough search for the current regulatory status of HPMCAS, relevant to its use in food in the United States, was conducted and no information was located. The starting raw material used in the production of HPMCAS by Shin-Etsu, HPMC, is an approved food additive pursuant to 21 CFR 172.874.

6.10 Basis for the GRAS Conclusion

Shin-Etsu's Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS has been the subject of a thorough safety assessment as described above. The totality of evidence supporting safety is comprised of data and information that establish the safety of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS under the conditions of its intended use and data and information that is corroborative of safety. The general availability and general acceptance, throughout the scientific community of qualified experts, of the data and information that establish the safety of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS under its intended conditions of use establish the general recognition of this data and information. Together, the establishment of safety based on scientific procedures and its general recognition form the basis for Shin-Etsu's conclusion of GRAS status of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS for its intended use.

6.10.1 Data and Information that Establish Safety

The scientific data, information, and methods forming the basis of this conclusion are:

- The establishment of identity, demonstrating Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS is a pure compound classified as "modified cellulose";
- The method of manufacture and specifications, demonstrating the safe production and the robust quality control standards of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS;
- The pharmacokinetic studies demonstrating related modified cellulose substances, including the starting material, HPMC, for manufacture of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS, are minimally absorbed and excreted almost exclusively in the feces following oral administration;
- The 8-week and 26-week repeated-dose oral toxicity studies in rats on Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS demonstrating no evidence of histopathological changes or other toxicological effects and, thereby, establishing a lack of adverse health effects or target organs from repeated exposure to Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS in rats;
- Several reproductive and developmental toxicity studies in rats and rabbits demonstrating no evidence of concerns for toxic effects of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS on fertility and reproductive performance in rats or growth and development in rats and rabbits; and
- The conservative exposure estimates for the intended conditions of use.

Data indicates that modified celluloses are not absorbed to any significant extent by rats or humans, and the reports of EFSA and JECFA summarized in Subpart 6.5 of this GRAS notice demonstrate the general acceptance of this data. As such, the imposition of limits on exposure in humans are not necessary in order to establish a reasonable certainty of safety of the intended use of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS based on the totality of data presented in this GRAS notice. In the 8-week and 26-week oral toxicity studies and the reproductive and developmental toxicity studies the NOAELs were 2500 mg/kg bw/day in male and female Sprague Dawley rats; these were the maximum feasible doses that could be administered to the animals, and therefore, the highest doses tested. NOAELs for developmental toxicity in New Zealand White rabbits were also 2500 mg/kg bw/day, the highest dose tested. Based on the intended use of the ingredient as an enteric coating agent, carrier for solid dispersions, and capsule shell, the maximum EDI at the 90th percentile of consumers in the total population is approximately 47.1 mg/kg bw/day, and the highest maximum EDI at the 90th percentile of consumers in the consumer subgroups (children ages 2–12 y) is 52.6 mg/kg bw/day. The evidence presented in this report supports a conclusion that the intended use of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS is reasonably certain to be safe.

6.10.2 Data and Information that are Corroborative of Safety

The safety of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS is corroborated by:

- Multiple experiments in mice, rats, guinea pigs, dogs, and frogs to evaluate effects of intraperitoneal and oral doses of HPMCAS on central and autonomic nervous systems and cardiovascular and digestive systems that showed no significant adverse effects;
- The acute toxicity studies in rabbits and rats demonstrating the LD₅₀ > 2.5 g/kg bw HPMCAS;
- The approval of HPMCAS as an inactive ingredient in pharmaceutical preparations;
- The sales of approximately 3000 metric tons of its Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS without any post-market adverse event reports;
- Data and information establishing the safety of HPMC, a related modified cellulose and starting material for the manufacture of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS, including the review of multiple toxicological studies in rats, rabbits, and dogs, the published 90-day oral toxicity studies in mice, rats, dogs, and nonhuman primates, and the approved food additive and GRAS statuses of the ingredient;
- The general scientific recognition of the safety of modified celluloses, including the substantial history of use of the similar substance HPMC as a food additive for over 50 years, the 2007 FDA ‘no questions’ letter for HPMC GRAS use up to 20 g/person/day, the generally accepted knowledge that this class of ingredients has a non-absorbable nature within the human gastrointestinal tract, and the human data reviewed by JECFA on modified celluloses in general indicating no adverse effects (specifically no significant clinical laxative effects) upon ingestion of up to 30 g/day/person;
- The unpublished toxicokinetic study on Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS supporting the general consensus that modified celluloses are not significantly absorbed and excreted mainly in the feces and also supporting the interpretation of effects observed in the oral toxicological studies as without toxicological relevance and unrelated to administration of the test item.

6.10.3 General Recognition

The scientific data, information, and methods herein reported, that provide the basis of this GRAS conclusion by scientific procedures are published and available in the public domain. Part 7 of this GRAS notice contains the citations for the published studies. These publicly available data and information fulfill the requirement of the GRAS standard for general availability of the scientific data, information, and methods relied on to establish the safety of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS for its intended conditions of use. The peer-review of the published studies and lack of Letters to the Editor or other dissenting opinions, as well as the opinions of EFSA and JECFA and the FDA ‘no questions’ response letter to a GRAS notice with respect to similar modified celluloses provide ample evidence of general recognition among qualified experts that there is reasonable certainty that consumption of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS for its intended use is not harmful. The general availability and acceptance of these scientific data, information, and methods satisfy the criterion of the GRAS standard that general recognition of safety requires common knowledge throughout the scientific community knowledgeable about the safety of substances directly or indirectly added to food that there is reasonable certainty that the substance is not harmful under the conditions of its intended use.

6.10.4 Data and Information that are Inconsistent with the GRAS Conclusion

In the peri- and postnatal developmental toxicity study in rats by Hoshi et al. (1985), reported in Subpart 6.2.7, there were some statistically significant dose-related findings that were not adequately explained by the data presented in the study.¹⁰ Nonetheless, as discussed in Subpart 6.2.7, we believe the totality of evidence presented in this GRAS notice with respect to developmental and reproductive toxicity and toxicokinetics of Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS sufficiently lay to rest any concerns that this data may present.

We have reviewed the available data and information and are not aware of any additional data and information that are, or may appear to be, inconsistent with our conclusion of GRAS status.

6.10.5 Information that is Exempt from Disclosure under FOIA

There are no data or information in this GRAS notice that are considered exempt from disclosure under FOIA as trade secret or commercial or financial information that is privileged or confidential.

Part 7: Supporting Data and Information

Initial literature searches for the safety assessment described in Part 6 of this GRAS notice were conducted between May 2015 and January 2016. Additional literature searches were conducted from December 2018 through August 2019 and on June 15, 2020.

7.1 Data and Information that are not Generally Available

The following information described in this GRAS notice is not generally available:

- The unpublished toxicokinetic study in rats on Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS summarized in Subpart 6.1.1 of this report.

This study corroborates the general recognition that modified celluloses are not significantly absorbed and are excreted intact in the feces and also corroborates the interpretation of the toxicological data on Shin-Etsu AQOAT[®] HPMCAS. Therefore, we believe the safety conclusion can still be made even if qualified experts throughout the scientific community do not generally have access to this information.

GRN 960 Questions

Chemistry:

1. The specification for heavy metals as lead (≤ 10 mg/kg) appears high and uses a colorimetric method for the analysis. Please provide batch analysis for three non-consecutive lots of hypromellose acetate succinate (HPMCAS) for lead using a more sensitive method (e.g., ICP-MS) and revise the lead specification to be consistent with the results of the batch analyses.

Notifier Response: We agree with FDA that a concentration limit on potential exposure to lead from the intended use of AQOAT® HPMCAS of ≤ 10 ppm appears high. If lead were present in the ingredient at the maximum concentration (i.e., 10 ppm) allowed by the specified limit, it would result in an estimated maximum aggregate daily exposure at the 90th percentile of consumers of 33.5 $\mu\text{g}/\text{day}$ (equivalent to approximately 0.466 $\mu\text{g}/\text{kg bw}/\text{day}$) in adults 20+ years and approximately 8 $\mu\text{g}/\text{day}$ (equivalent to approximately 0.526 $\mu\text{g}/\text{kg bw}/\text{day}$) in children 2–12 years.

The heavy metal specification (10 ppm) stated in GRN 000960 is based on the Japanese Pharmacopeia (JP). Shin-Etsu supplies NF-grade HPMCAS for dietary supplement, as well as pharmaceutical, use. The USP/NF has deleted Heavy Metal test in individual monographs since 2018, as the ICH Q3D-based control for heavy metals has been established. Since Shin-Etsu supplies NF-grade HPMCAS, the level of heavy metals including lead is controlled according to ICH-Q3D, which is reflected as USP <232>. In our internal control level, the limit for lead is less than 0.15 ppm (this number is 30% of 0.5 ppm listed in Table A.2.2 of ICH Q3D or Table 3 of USP<232>).

In accordance with FDA's request, we have provided three batch analyses (see the table below) using ICP-MS analyses according to a validated internal method and have revised the ingredient specification for lead to be ≤ 0.15 ppm according to the aforementioned method.

Lot Number	Date of manufacturer	Results—Lead (ppm)
0023063	03/04/2020	< 0.01
9033069	03/12/2019	0.01
8033047	03/08/2018	<0.01

2. The notifier indicates that acetic acid residue levels are less than 5000 mg/kg in the final ingredient. However, batch analyses were not provided to support this statement. Acetic acid is affirmed as generally recognized as safe under 21 CFR 184.1005 for use in food at levels consistent with good manufacturing practice, which results in a level of acetic acid in the finished food of less than 0.15% (1500 mg/kg). Please provide results from three non-consecutive batch analyses for acetic acid indicating that the use of acetic acid is consistent with 21 CFR 184.1005.

Notifier Response: Free acetic acid is tested as part of its compendial test "Limit of free acetic acid and free succinic acid" in USP/NF with a limit of not more than 1.0% as the sum of free acetic acid and free succinic acid. As demonstrated in the batch analyses of three lots reported in GRN 000960, the sum of free acetic and succinic acids ranged from 50 to 70 ppm (note, because this is a sum, of free acetic acid and free succinic acid, the total free acetic acid must be less than the sum). Please find the results of three batch additional batch analyses reproduced in the table below. For purposes of addressing the limit imposed by 21 CFR 184.1005 specifically, we have provided the results for each acid separately as well as the reportable sum as specified by the USP/NF monograph and reflected in the ingredient specification. These results demonstrate the typical concentration of free acetic acid present in AQOAT® HPMCAS as well as demonstrating compliance with the ingredient specification and the USP<467> PDE limit for class 3 solvents. These results are, also, consistent with those reported in GRN 000960.

We also note that the limit of 0.15% (1500 ppm) acetic acid for “all other food categories” (as well as the limits for specific food categories) specified by 21 CFR 184.1005 relate to the concentration in the final food product “as served”. AQOAT® HPMCAS is not a final food product that is served. Rather is an ingredient to be used in the manufacture of tablets, granules, pellets, and capsules for use in manufacturing dietary supplements. In other words, the dietary supplement is the final food product to be served. As such, the amount of residual acetic acid potentially present in the final food product as served will be diluted with respect to the amount present in AQOAT® HPMCAS. Nonetheless, the results of the 6 batch analyses provided demonstrate that the levels of free acetic acid present in AQOAT® HPMCAS are well below the limit of 1500 ppm imposed for food as served by 21 CFR 184.1005.

Lot Number	Date of Manufacture	Free acetic acid (ppm)	Free succinic acid (ppm)	Sum (ppm)
1023045	02/08/2021	40	20	60
0123293	12/15/2020	80	50	130
9033071	03/16/2019	30	20	50

3. Please state the analytical methods used for all analyses and indicate that they are validated for their intended purpose.

Notifier Response: All tests except the following two are according to the monograph of Hypromellose Acetate Succinate in USP/NF, therefore validated for their intended purpose.

Other methods:

- Lead (ICP-MS): Internally validated for its internal purpose. The method was developed prior to the official adoption of USP<233> but is very similar.
- Particle Size (Laser Diffraction): Internal method based on USP <429>. Internally validated for its internal purpose.

4. On page 11, the notifier indicates that the raw materials and the manufacturing process comply with European Pharmacopoeia, United States Pharmacopoeia-National Formulary, and/or Japanese Pharmacopoeia specifications or appropriate product monographs. Please confirm that all raw materials are approved for their respective use via a regulation in Part 21 of the U.S. Code of Federal Regulations, are the subject of an effective food contact notification, or are GRAS for that use in the U.S.

Notifier Response: We are confused by this question. There is no requirement, of which we are aware, for reactants and reagents used in the manufacture of synthetic food ingredients to be approved for such uses via a regulation in Part 21 of the U.S. Code of Federal Regulations, an effective food contact notification, or a GRAS conclusion. Such a requirement, from a practical perspective, would virtually preclude the use of synthetic chemicals in food altogether as the vast potential of different uses and combinations makes a regulatory submission for every such use impractical and would surely stifle innovation and/or bury OFAS in orders of magnitudes of submissions more than current or reasonably foreseeable future levels.

Reactants and reagents used in the production of synthetic food ingredients are generally of food or laboratory grade and are consumed during the reaction and/or removed by manufacturing processes with only trace contaminant levels remaining in the finished product within established and accepted limits (e.g., ICH/USP PDE for residual solvents). They are not analogous to ingredients that may remain in a finished ingredient, such as carriers, binders, or other processing aids or flavors, preservatives, etc. that are intended to remain in the finished food ingredients where they serve a technical or functional purpose as discrete substances.

The regulation cited by FDA above for acetic acid provides a good example (and many others can be found) of the lack of such requirements for reactants and reagents: Pursuant to 21 CFR 184.1005(a), methanol (a highly toxic chemical) is used in the manufacture of acetic acid; however, to the best of our knowledge, there is no regulation in Part 21 of the U.S. Code of Federal Regulations, effective food contact notification, or a GRAS conclusion for methanol as a food ingredient for any intended use. However, the use of methanol in the manufacture of acetic acid is described in 21 CFR 184.1005(a), just as the use of the reactants and reagents used in the manufacture of AQOAT® HPMCAS are described in GRN 000960, and food grade specifications for limits on free acetic and succinic acids, acetyl content, methoxy content, and hydroxypropyl content are described.

Nonetheless, below we provide a list of regulations in Part 21 of the U.S. Code of Federal Regulations, effective food contact notifications, or GRAS conclusions for the raw materials (reactants and reagents) used in the manufacture of AQOAT® HPMCAS.

- Hydroxypropyl methylcellulose (hypromellose), pursuant to 21 CFR 172.874, is an approved multipurpose food additive for direct addition to food for human consumption as an emulsifier, film former, protective colloid, stabilizer, suspending agent, or thickener in accordance with current good manufacturing practice.
- Acetic acid, pursuant to 21 CFR 184.1005, is GRAS for direct use in food as a solvent and vehicle at levels not to exceed current good manufacturing practice, such that the concentration in the final food product as served does not exceed 0.15% (1500 ppm).
- Acetic anhydride: No direct regulation in Part 21 of the U.S. Code of Federal Regulations, effective food contact notification, or GRAS conclusion was located. However, “food starch-modified” is an approved multipurpose food additive for direct addition to food for human consumption pursuant to 21 CFR 172.892, and acetic anhydride is a listed substance to effect such modification pursuant to 21 CFR 172.892(d) and (f).

- Succinic anhydride: No direct regulation in Part 21 of the U.S. Code of Federal Regulations, effective food contact notification, or GRAS conclusion was located. However, “food starch-modified” is an approved multipurpose food additive for direct addition to food for human consumption pursuant to 21 CFR 172.892, and succinic anhydride is a listed substance to effect such modification pursuant to 21 CFR 172.892(d) and (f). Additionally, succinic anhydride is listed as a reactant in FCN No. 1359.
- Sodium acetate, pursuant to 21 CFR 184.1721, is GRAS for direct use in food as a flavoring agent and adjuvant and as a pH control agent at levels not to exceed current good manufacturing practice. Additionally, sodium acetate is an approved specific usage secondary direct food additive permitted for use in food for human consumption as a boiler water additive with no limitations other than current good manufacturing practice (i.e., not in excess of the amount necessary to achieve its functional purpose) pursuant to 21 CFR 173.310. Sodium acetate is also GRAS for use as a substance migrating from cotton and cotton fabrics used in dry food packaging pursuant to 21 CFR 182.70
- Water: Except for the requirements for specific standardized beverages pertaining to bottled water, no direct regulation in Part 21 of the U.S. Code of Federal Regulations, effective food contact notification, or GRAS conclusion was located.

Additionally, in its opinion on acetates (SCOGS Report Number 82), SCOGS noted that acetates are “normal metabolic intermediates produced in relatively large quantities during the digestion and metabolism of foods” and opined that there was “no evidence” “that demonstrates, or suggests reasonable grounds to suspect, a hazard to the public” when acetic acid or sodium acetate “are used at levels that are now current or might reasonably be expected in the future.” We additionally note here that acetic anhydride is also an acetate.

Toxicology:

Please provide a clear justification to support your determination that the no-observed adverse effect level (NOAEL) from the toxicology studies your provided was the highest dose tested in these studies (2500 mg/kg bw/day).

Given that the highest dose which you have identified as the NOAEL has lots of toxicological effects in several of the toxicological studies as highlighted below, by definition, the highest dose of 2500 mg/kg bw /day should not be the NOAEL. Whether or not some of these effects are statistically significant, or whether there is a dose-response or not, some of them include appreciable increase in some organ weight much more than 10%, and there is a trend of increase or decrease of an effect.

In addition, since the NOAEL should not be the highest dose of 2500 mg/kg bw/day based on all these toxicological effects at this dose as highlighted below, the margin of exposure, which is the NOAEL / estimated daily intake, would be reduced.

1. In the subchronic oral toxicity study in rats, there were dose -dependent statistically significant decreases in WBC count and platelet count in the high dose (HD) males and a statistically significant decrease in WBC in the low dose (LD) and HD females. In addition, there was a significant decrease in platelet count in HD males. Splenic hemosiderosis was reported to occur in LD and HD females. In the highlighted data in the table 9 (below), there is a clear trend towards a decrease. Although every datapoint is not statistically significant, the trend shows a possible physiological/biochemical basis for such change. Various metal toxicants, radiation, show a similar reduction in WBC. Just saying “changes are relatively small; hence not to worry” is not enough. Please provide an explanation.

Notifier Response: There was dose-related decrease in WBC count, becoming statistically significant at the high dose, in males. Nonetheless, the reported values generally agree with published reference ranges for Sprague-Dawley rats¹⁻⁶; thus, while a dose-related trend was observed that was statistically significant at the high dose, published reference data suggests these observations may not have been clinically significant.

Aside: It should also be pointed out, in considering published reference data, that rats from which published ranges are established may not have been exactly the same age or quite in the same age range as the rats in this study and the site and procedure of blood collection, analytical instrument, and instrument calibration may have differed, all of which cause variation in data, and unfortunately, Hoshi et al. did not report historical data of the laboratory, which may not have existed. In the study by Hoshi et al., the rats were approximately 12 to 13 weeks old at the time of blood collection from the carotid artery without anesthesia. In terms of the published reference range data cited above, the data from Charles River is an interesting example in that the male rats, including the controls, were all substantially below the lower end of the WBC data ranges for rats in both the 8–12 and 13–22 week ranges while all female group means, including the statistically significant means at the low and high doses, were within these same ranges.

On the other hand, in the female rats, it is clear that there is no dose-related trend in WBC counts. Even though both low- and high-dose group means were statistically significantly decreased compared to controls, the mid-dose group mean was considerably higher than either the low- or high-dose means and, albeit slightly lower, did not differ statistically from the control mean. When considering a dose-response pattern, it is also notable that the high-dose mean is slightly higher than the low-dose mean.

The authors also failed to measure and report the WBC differential counts, without which, it is difficult to attribute clinical meaning to the total WBC count. We did note that one male rat at the mid-dose and one male rat at the high-dose had histological evidence of ‘+’ severity pneumonia and one male rat at the high-dose had histological evidence of ‘±’ severity bronchitis (assuming ‘-’ severity means no finding; otherwise, all animals in all groups had pneumonia and bronchitis); however, if this low incidence was enough to cause a statistically significant difference in the group mean for WBC count, the shift would have been expected to be an increase rather than a decrease. Additionally, these findings, being present in the high-dose group males only would not explain the dose-related decrease. That no other study parameter alterations, including histopathology, were present that could explain a pathological or toxicological cause for the dose-related, statistically significant at the high-dose, decrease in WBC count, the evidence for published reference data indicating the WBC counts are in general agreement with normal ranges for WBC counts in SD rats, and the fact that the test item is not absorbed from the gastrointestinal tract, strongly suggest that the WBC count findings in the male rats are coincidental in exhibiting a dose-response and statistical significance compared to the control at the high dose and have no clinical relevance. There is a remote, but highly unlikely scenario in which the decreased WBC counts could be due to sequestering of vitamin B12 or folate in the gut (which could also explain the decreased platelet count at the high dose); however, this is not corroborated by an effect on RBC counts, hematocrit, hemoglobin, or any other study parameters, and is unlikely due to the daily bolus dosing by gavage while the animals had ad libitum access to diet. Thus, regardless of an apparent dose-related, statistically significant at the high dose, but likely clinically insignificant, decrease in WBC counts observed the male animals, in the absence of correlations to any toxicologically relevant changes in other study parameters, there is no reason to conclude the observed hematological changes as adverse. This conclusion is corroborated by the absence of statistically significant changes in hematology parameters in the 26-week chronic study summarized in Subpart 6.2.3 of GRN 000960.

It is hard to put the platelet counts into a meaningful context with respect to published reference data as the units reported by Hoshi et al. do not make biological sense. They appear to differ from published reference ranges by 4 to 5 orders of magnitude. However, if making the assumption that the units for platelets are incorrectly recorded in the publication by Hoshi et al. and that they should be the same as the units given for platelets in Table 26 for the chronic study reported in the same article, then we can put them into a biologically plausible context. Under this assumption, all the platelet counts reported in both the subchronic and chronic studies, including the concurrent control counts, fall generally below the above cited published reference data in 4 of the 6 cited studies that report data for platelets but are well within the ranges reported by Delwatta et al.. Unfortunately, the authors did not measure and report coagulation parameters; however, no severe hemorrhages were observed that could explain a lower platelet count in high-dose males. While speculative, we believe the most likely cause is either spurious (e.g., platelet aggregation or large platelets) or normal variation.

While splenic hemosiderin deposition was observed in almost all animals, we perhaps did not describe it with enough clarity in Subpart 6.2.2 of GRN 000960. There was no overall difference in incidence or dose-related increase in severity among the groups (including the control group). In the female groups, the incidence was 9, 10, 10, and 10, in the control, low-, mid-, and high-dose groups, respectively, while in the male groups, 10 of 10 animals were affected in all groups, assuming that ‘-’ should be interpreted to mean minimal to mild severity rather than that the lesion was not present. If assuming the latter, the incidence would be 9, 9, 0, and 10 in the female control, low-, mid-, and high-dose groups, respectively, while in the males the incidence would be 5, 6, 4, and 3 in the control, low-, mid-, and high-dose groups, respectively. In the female low- and high-dose groups, '+' severity hemosiderin deposition occurred with the greatest within group incidence—in the low-dose females '-' severity (likely meaning not present) was observed in 1 animal, '±' severity was observed in 2 animals, and '+' severity was observed in 7 animals, and in the high-dose females, '-' severity was observed in 0 animals, '±' severity was observed in 3 animals, and '+' severity was observed in 7 animals. While the within group incidence of '+' severity in these groups correlated with the statistically significant decreases in WBC counts observed in these groups, the correlation is not likely to be representative of a causal relationship. In all other groups, '+' severity hemosiderosis occurred with the lowest within group incidence, and in the control males, mid-dose females, mid-dose males, and high-dose males, '-' severity occurred with greatest within group incidence. In no case was a dose-related increase in severity observed between the groups.

In addition, several alterations in absolute and relative organ weights were reported in the treatment groups (tables 10 and 11 below). For example:

- there was a decrease in absolute and relative lung weight, though statistically significant in the MD males only. No lung weights were reported for the females.

Notifier Response: The statistically significant decreases observed in absolute lung weight and lung weight relative to body weight at the mid dose in male animals were not dose-related and there was no correlating histopathology; therefore, they were not considered to be test item-related. There were no statistically significant differences in absolute or relative lungs weights observed in the treated female groups compared to controls.

- there was ~ 35% increase in absolute thyroid weight in LD female rats. There was increase in relative thyroid weight in the LD female rats.

Please provide an explanation why these alterations in absolute and relative organ weights are not of toxicological concern.

Notifier Response: The statistically significant increases observed in absolute thyroid weight and thyroid weight relative to body weight at the low dose in female animals were not dose-related and there was no correlating histopathology. Additionally, these changes were in the opposite direction to the statistically significant decreases observed in absolute thyroid weight and thyroid weight relative to body weight at the low dose in male animals, which also occurred without a dose-response or correlating histopathology. For these reasons, they were not considered to be test item-related in either sex. With respect to the magnitude of change in the low-dose female group, we can only speculate. This is an old study conducted prior to harmonization and currently accepted standards; in addition, trimming of the thyroid requires a great deal of skill. It is possible that the reported change is an artifact of poor trimming.

Further, there is a big discrepancy in the absolute thyroid weight between the male and female rats in table 10. The male thyroid weight for the control animals is ~ 191.3 mg compared to the female thyroid weight which is 16.75 mg. Based on this, it means that the male thyroid gland is 11 times larger than the female thyroid gland? A search of the scientific literature revealed that thyroid weights of a male rat is not in the range you provided in Table 10 below. This appears to be an error in the thyroid weight of the male rats in table 10. Please crosscheck that.

Notifier Response: Thank you for pointing out this discrepancy. The male absolute thyroid data reported in Table 10 of GRN 000960 is an error, the introduction of which we are at a loss to explain. Please find the corrected Table 10 inserted below. For thoroughness, we have also crosschecked the rest of the data in the organ weight tables and found it to be correct.

All of the above statistically significant changes were considered relatively small in magnitude and/or were not dose-dependent and were without correlating histopathology with the possible exception of the decreased WBC count in low- and high-dose females which may be correlated with splenic hemosiderosis observed in these animals. As statistically significant decreases were not observed in RBC

Furthermore, you identified the NOAEL for this subchronic study to be the highest dose of 2500 mg/kg bw/day (page 26 of the notice). However, these animals were administered HPMCAS 6 days a week, and not 7 days a week.

Notifier Response: We agree with FDA that that an averaging of the dose should be performed based on the dose administration schedule of only 6 days per week. Thus, the highest dose should be considered to be approximately 2143 mg/kg bw/day. This difference results in only a minor reduction in margin of exposure.

- 2. In the Chronic Repeated Dose Oral Toxicity Study (26-week), there is a clear trend of relative thyroid weight increase, with a statistically significant increase in the LD male rats (Table 13 below). The mean increase in thyroid wt. is ~30-50%. Was there no follicular hyperplasia or hypertrophy? Please explain the weight increase (other than water retention, because that needs a biochemical explanation as well). It is important to note that this observation of a thyroid weight increase was also seen in the male and female LD rats in the sub-chronic study, suggesting a progression. The relative thyroid weights for female rats in this chronic study were not provided in the notification.

Notifier Response: Statistically significant increases were observed in males in absolute right thyroid weight at the high dose, absolute left thyroid weight at the low dose, and both right and left thyroid weights relative to body weight at the low dose. The statistically significant increase in absolute right thyroid weight was dose related. The increasing trend in right thyroid weight relative to body weight was also dose related although the statistical significance was not. However, given the greater magnitude of change at the high dose, it is odd that the low dose was statistically significant compared to control while the high dose was not. We speculate that it is possible that the study authors transposed the linking asterisk for statistical significance from the high dose to the low dose row of the table. These changes in thyroid weights were not correlated with any gross or histopathological findings or with any behavioral or body weight changes that could be indicative of altered thyroid function. No statistically significant changes were observed in absolute or relative thyroid weights in the female groups.

The direction of change in males in the subchronic study was opposite the direction of change in males in the chronic study and there was no dose-relationship in the subchronic study, which suggests a progression is unlikely. These studies provide no biochemical explanation for the observed thyroid weight changes. However, the absence of dose-related correlations in histopathology is a strong indicator of the lack of toxicological relevance of the thyroid weight alterations observed. The most plausible explanation is inexperience on the part of the technician performing gross necropsy and trimming of the thyroid glands. Furthermore, toxicokinetic data does not support a systemic effect of the test item on the thyroid. Thus, we conclude the evidence supports the determination that these thyroid weight alterations hold little, if any, toxicological relevance.

A statistically significant increase in absolute left thyroid weight in the males in the low-dose group and a statistically significant increase in absolute right thyroid weight in the males in the high-dose group were observed. Absolute right adrenal weights in males in the low- and high-dose groups were also statistically significantly increased, although not dose-dependently. In males, various statistically significant changes in the mean organ weight relative to body weight ratios were recorded (see table below), but no correlating histopathology was observed in these organs. No statistically significant changes were found in absolute or relative organ weights in the female animals.

Furthermore, you identified the NOAEL for this chronic study to be the highest dose of 2500 mg/kg bw/day (page 28 of the notice). However, these animals were administered HPMCAS 6 days a week, and not 7 days a week.

Notifier Response: We agree with FDA that that an averaging of the dose should be performed based on the dose administration schedule of only 6 days per week. Thus, the highest dose should be considered to be approximately 2143 mg/kg bw/day. This difference results in only a minor reduction in margin of exposure.

4. In the fertility study, skeletal malformations were reported in the HD fetuses. Please provide an explanation why these malformations in the HD fetuses are not of any toxicological concern.

Notifier Response: While the NOAEL was determined by the authors, rather than us, we did not disagree with the determination. The dosing period in this study ended prior to the significant period of organogenesis in which the skeleton is most susceptible to a teratogenic effect, making it less likely that even a systemically bioavailable test item with known skeletal teratogenicity would induce an effect on skeletal development, and suggesting that this study protocol was inappropriate for evaluation of developmental endpoints (i.e., that external, visceral, and skeletal fetal morphology examinations were inappropriate endpoints for evaluation in this study). In addition to the dosing period, the toxicokinetic profile of the test item should also be considered here, as well all as with all the studies reported in Part 6.2 of GRN 000960 (more below). It also appears that the fetus, rather than the litter, was the unit of analysis in this study (although both litter and fetal incidences should be reported), and it does not appear that any statistical analyses of incidence of malformations were performed, further confounding interpretation of the results. Also, in our opinion, the lack of comparison to historical controls is unacceptable when attempting to evaluate the biological relevance of rare events, making it very difficult to draw conclusions related to skeletal malformations in this study, notwithstanding the three previous issues. Given these factors, in our opinion, further assessment would be necessary to confirm the results of the fetal development effects reported in this study in order to determine a NOAEL with respect to such effects. Thus, we consider as noteworthy in such determination that the skeletal malformations reported in this study were not reproduced in the EFD studies in rats (Subpart 6.2.5) or rabbits (Subpart 6.2.6), or the more recent post harmonization EFD studies in rats and rabbits conducted by Cappon et al. (Subpart 6.2.8) in the same strains of rats and rabbits specifically because of the deficiencies noted in the earlier studies by Hoshi, et. al. Note, also, in the aforementioned EFD studies dosing occurred during the period of organogenesis and, therefore, they carry greater weight in the interpretation of fetal morphology.

5. In the embryo-fetal developmental tox studies, a statistically significant decrease in the mean number of sternal vertebral centra in fetuses of the HD group dams compared to control was observed. Please provide an explanation why this decrease in the mean number of sternal vertebral centra is not of any toxicological concern.

Notifier Response: Again, in these studies in rats and rabbits conducted by Hoshi et al., it appears that the fetus, rather than the litter, was the unit of analysis. While both fetal and litter incidence should be reported, it is important to know the distribution per litter when evaluating such effects. In terms of skeletal variations, there were no statistically significant or dose-related differences observed. In terms of ossification state, in the rat study (Subpart 6.2.5), the mean number of cervical vertebral centra (note, sternal vertebral centra was a typo in our submission) was slightly, but statistically significantly, decreased in the high-dose group compared to the control group; however, the decrease was not dose related. It is also important to bear in mind that implantation may occur over a number of hours due to repeated matings occurring overnight and resulting in fetuses of all different ages. Thus, variations, including delayed ossification, observed may have resolved had necropsy been conducted an hour or so later. It is very important to read observed changes against the historical control, rather than only the concurrent control, in order to put them in proper perspective with respect to a test item effect versus background noise. Overall, the pattern of ossification delay observed in this study is not unusual and is consistent with a slight delay in ossification of low significance (for example, no delays in normally well ossified bones were observed). In addition, there were no statistically significant or dose related changes in ossification state observed in the EFD study in rabbits by Hoshi et al. (Subpart 6.2.6) or, more importantly, in the EFD study conducted by Cappon et al. in the same strain (Subpart 6.2.8) in accordance with internationally harmonized standards and in which the litter was the unit of statistical analysis, and comparison was made against the historical control of the breeder.

6. In the Peri- and Postnatal Developmental Toxicity Study with Extended evaluation in rats, several alterations in absolute and relative organ weights were reported in the treatment groups (tables 19, 20, and 21). For example:

- In the HD group (2500 mg/kg bw/day), the absolute liver weight was significantly increased in HD male F1a; and the relative liver weight was increased in both HD male F1a and female F1a pups compared with the control.
- The left and total kidney weights relative to body weight were also statistically significantly dose-dependently increased in the high-dose F1a males and females.
- Statistically significant dose-related decreases in absolute and relative right ovary weights were observed in high-dose female F1a pups.
- The thymus weight relative to body weight was statistically significantly dose-dependently increased in high dose females.

The authors of this study did not provide any historical control data or histology and concluded that the observed organ weight changes were without toxicological concern. Without these data, a conclusion cannot be drawn that all these alterations in absolute and relative organ weights are of no toxicological concern. Please provide an explanation why you think all these alterations in absolute and relative organ weights are not of any toxicological or biological relevance.

Notifier Response: In this study dosing was initiated following the period of organogenesis and carried through to weaning. Due to the toxicokinetic properties of the test item, it is unlikely that fetuses were directly exposed during the pre-natal dosing, as this would require absorption across the intestinal border of the dam and then across the blood-placental barrier, nor is it likely that pups were exposed to the test item through the milk of the dams, as this would require absorption across the intestinal border of the dam followed by secretion into the milk followed by absorption across the intestinal border of the pup. Thus, any effects of the test item on the developmental maturation of the pup would likely arise as a result of the test item sequestering essential nutrients within the intestinal lumen of the dams. However, the dams had continuous access to food and water while exposure to the test item occurred only once daily as a gavage bolus. Additionally, there were no effects observed on maternal growth or other signs of maternal toxicity nor was growth and development of the pups affected. Furthermore, the authors did not report historical control ranges or conduct pathological (clinical, gross, and histo) examinations that could have demonstrated whether the organ weight alterations were within the limits of normal biological variation and potentially identify causes of the organ weight alterations if outside of normal variation, respectively. Thus, as noted in Subpart 6.10.4 of GRN 000960, these observations cannot be adequately explained by the study. Nonetheless, as indicated above, due to the toxicokinetics of the test item and the absence of maternal toxicity, together with the lack of effects on these organs in the other toxicological studies conducted on this test item, we conclude that they are unlikely to be related to administration of the test item.

Additional Notifier Response: In addition to the discussions above, it is important to consider the toxicokinetics of the test item. Published kinetic studies on related substances (Subpart 6.1.2) indicate that oral bioavailability of modified celluloses is very low, and this is generally accepted for plant fibers as a class. Further, an unpublished toxicokinetic (mass balance) study on AQOAT® HPMCAS in Sprague-Dawley rats (Subpart 6.1.1) is consistent with the published data, confirming that absorption of AQOAT® HPMCAS is also poor. In particular, cumulative fecal recovery of radioactivity was 94.4% (range, 87.5–104.1%) in males and 96.8% (range, 90.6–101.2%) in females, and no trace radioactivity was measured in blood and tissue samples. Thus, similar to other celluloses, the potential for orally administered AQOAT® HPMCAS to produce systemic toxicity is low.

In summary, the toxicology studies published in 1985 by Hoshi et al., and summarized in Subparts 6.2.1–6.2.7, were not conducted in accordance with current internationally recognized harmonized standards, contain many deficiencies, and are poorly reported and difficult to interpret. Nonetheless, in considering the kinetic data together with the above discussions, the weight of evidence provided by these studies when viewed together is supportive of determinations of NOAELs of 2143 mg/kg bw/day in the subchronic and chronic studies rats and, with the exception of the PND study, 2500 mg/kg bw/day in the DART studies in rats and rabbits, the highest doses tested, and according to the authors, the highest feasible dose based on the physiochemical properties of the test item. Furthermore, the EFD study conducted in accordance with internationally harmonized standards, and using the same strains of rats and rabbits, by Cappon et al. lays to rest certain ambiguities in the EFD studies by Hoshi et al., and provides its own NOAELs for maternal and developmental toxicity of 2500 mg/kg bw/day in rats and rabbits.

GRN 960 Amendment #2:

Notifier Responses to May 13, 2021 Zoom Conference with FDA and the FDA Written Follow-up Titled: DFI Toxicology Comments on 05/10/2021 Meeting with Notifier (received May 19, 2021)
(note, the date contained within the title of FDA's comments is incorrect)

Kinetics and Toxicology:

As noted in GRN 960, Subpart 6.5.1, page 44, EFSA did not find it necessary specify an ADI for a group of modified and unmodified celluloses as they are not absorbed and are excreted intact in the feces. EFSA also considered it possible to read-across between all the celluloses. Similarly, as noted in GRN 960, Subpart 6.5.2, pages 44–45, JECFA evaluated a group of seven modified celluloses and concluded that “the establishment of an acceptable daily intake (ADI) expressed in numerical form is not deemed necessary”. Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS (the subject of GRN 960) is a modified cellulose closely related to those substances evaluated by EFSA and JECFA, and an unpublished mass balance study sponsored by Shin-Etsu demonstrated that, like other modified celluloses, HPMCAS is not absorbed and is excreted in the feces (GRN 960, Subpart 6.1.1, pages 21–22).

Despite the above evidence, a battery of toxicological studies (summarized in GRN 960 Subparts 6.2.1–6.2.7, pages 23–38) conducted on Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS by Hoshi et al. (1985) reported some potentially test item-related findings at the high-dose of 2.5 g/kg bw administered to laboratory animals under various dosing schemes. Due to the known toxicokinetic data on HPMCAS and based on what can be assessed from the poorly reported studies by Hoshi et al., we believe it is likely that these findings are artifacts of design, conduction, and reporting problems with the Hoshi et al. studies.

This supposition is corroborated by EFD studies in rats and rabbits conducted by Cappon et al. (2003) in accordance with internationally harmonized guidelines, using the same animal strains, dose levels, and vehicle as evaluated by Hoshi et al., in order to investigate questionable findings in the Hoshi et al. EFD study in rats. The Cappon et al. studies were summarized in GRN 960, Subpart 6.2.8, pages 38–39. The findings of the EFD study in rats by Hoshi et al. (summarized in GRN 960, Subpart 6.2.5, pages 30–32) were not reproduced in the study by Cappon et al. and the authors concluded that HPMCAS was not teratogenic in rats and rabbits under the tested conditions and determined the NOAELs for maternal and developmental toxicity in both species as 2500 mg/kg bw/day during organogenesis. Nonetheless, no additional studies have been conducted to re-evaluate the questionable findings of the subchronic and chronic oral toxicity studies in rats conducted by Hoshi et al.; thus, corroboration that the findings in these studies were artifactual has not been demonstrated.

Regardless of whether the questionable findings in the Hoshi et al. subchronic and chronic studies are artifactual or real, the question remains as to whether, if real, they are toxicologically relevant.

In FDA's comments, DFI Toxicology noted the following concerns:

1. In the Acute study in Rabbits, there were significant changes in organ weights in the treated rabbits (second species) compared to control (Table 3 of Hoshi et al., 1985). For example, there was a statistically significant increase in abs. heart weight in female rabbits and a statistically significant increase in weight of right testes of male rabbits. In addition, there was a decrease (~ 55% decrease) in adrenal gland (R) and (L) in treated male rabbits compared to controls. Although there is no statistical significance, this decrease in adrenal weight in the treated group compared to control is biologically relevant given the role of the adrenal gland in regulating the endocrine system (metabolism, immune system, blood pressure etc).

2. In the Subchronic Toxicity Study in Rats, there was dose-related decrease in WBC count, becoming statistically significant at the high dose in both male and female rats. (Table 11 of Hoshi et al., 1985). While we agree with the Notifier that without historical control data provide by Hoshi et al., or without WBC differential count, it is difficult to make a judgment on the clinical significance of the decrease in WBC count observed in both male and female rats; however, using the concurrent control data, there is a ~ 24% decline (statistically significant) in HD female rats compared to concurrent controls and a 35% decline (statistically significant, $P < 0.05$) in HD male rats compared to concurrent control, with a dose response. In addition, there is a 44% decline in platelet count in the HD male rats compared to concurrent control with a DR. Deposition of hemosiderin occurred in almost all rats including the control group, so hemosiderosis does not explain the decrease in WBC count in the HD male and female rats. Based on these decreases in WBC, toxicology does not agree with the Notifier's establishment of the NOAEL as 2.5 g/kg bw for the subchronic study. Although no abnormalities were seen in the bone marrow of 1 HD female rat, and the absolute and relative spleen weights were not different between control and treated groups, these declines are huge (> 20%) and cannot be overlooked as not toxicologically and biologically relevant.
3. In the Chronic Toxicity Study in Rats, there was a statistically significant increase in the weights of thyroid (right) and thyroid (left) in male rats at the LD and HD, the two tested doses. In the subchronic study, there was a decrease in thyroid weight at the LD for male rats, whereas in the chronic study, there is an increase in thyroid weight. However, the subchronic study lasted for 8 weeks, whereas the chronic study lasted for 26 weeks, so this significant increase (~47% increase) for thyroid (right) and ~29% for thyroid (L) at HD and ~31% increase of the thyroid (right) and thyroid (left) at LD cannot be dismissed based on opposite direction of the change in males in the chronic study relative to the subchronic study. In the subchronic study, there was an increase in thyroid weight in female rats at the LD; whereas in the chronic study, there is no difference between control and treated female groups. According to the data from the mass balance and tissue distribution experiments provided by the Notifier, it indicates that HPMCAS when administered orally to rats is poorly absorbed and is primarily excreted through the feces within 48 hours, making it unlikely that HPMCAS will get to the thyroid gland. However, this huge increase in thyroid weight in the HD male rats cannot be dismissed without histopathology data to explain these huge increases.

With respect to the organ weight changes noted in rabbits in the acute study, we note that these changes were not observed in the acute study in rats nor were changes in heart or testes weights observed in the subchronic or chronic studies in rats that were administered the same high dose repeatedly as compared to the single dose administered in the acute study.

The observed non-statistically significant but, nonetheless, large (and possibly biologically significant) 55 and 53% decreases in right and left adrenal weights, respectively, in the male animals in the acute study in rabbits did not occur in the female animals. There were no effects on adrenal weights in the subchronic study in rats; however, in the chronic study in rats, right adrenal weights were statistically significantly increased in the males. Left adrenal weights were not affected in males and neither left nor right adrenal weights were affected in females. Further, no clinical pathology that could be indicative of adrenal function was observed (although specific endocrine parameters were not assessed) and no gross or histopathological changes were observed in the adrenals of male or female rats.

Thus, while the rat studies do not corroborate the acute organ weight changes observed in rabbits, as longer duration studies were not conducted in rabbits, these changes cannot be definitively ruled out as being species and sex specific adverse changes in rabbits. Nonetheless, we also note the following points of caution in interpreting these results: Hoshi et al. did not report randomization procedures for the acute, subchronic, or chronic studies; reductions in adrenal weights can occur due to stress; and Society of Toxicology considers organ weights of limited value in single-dose studies.¹

With respect to the WBC changes observed in the subchronic study in rats, we agree with FDA that there is a dose-related decrease in WBC count in males, becoming statistically significant at the at the high dose (–35%); however, while there are also statistically significant decreases at the low (–26%) and high (–24%) doses in females, there is not a dose response as the decrease relative to controls at the mid dose is 4% and non-significant (note, the beginning of a dose response at the high dose cannot be ruled out). FDA referred to these declines as huge in comparison to the concurrent control; however, we note that there is a wide range of normal biological variation in WBC counts. Therefore, this level of variation in white blood cell counts may be within normal biological variation (i.e., normal rather than huge) although as Hoshi et al. did not present historical control ranges of the laboratory (i.e., data derived over time from control animals in the same laboratory under identical conditions of housing, climate, health, handling, fasting status, draw site and procedure, age, sex, strain, body weight, and vehicle), a reliable normal range, and variation within that range for the animals used in this study is unknown.

FDA also commented on the statistically significant 44% decrease in platelet count at the high dose in male rats. In the absence of correlative evidence from other study parameters, we considered the change in platelets in males as most likely either spurious (e.g., platelet aggregation or large platelets), normal variation, or due to methodological problems with the Hoshi et al. study.

Additionally, in our response to the February 8 comments, we noted that no correlative evidence of either a pathological effect or an anti-nutritional effect of the test item that could account for the decrease in WBC counts or platelet counts that were reported by Hoshi et al. and that there were no hematological effects observed in the chronic rat study by Hosih et al.

With respect to the thyroid weight effects in the chronic study by Hoshi et al., we agree that the magnitudes of change are large; however, there was no correlating histopathology or other evidence that could be consistent with a disturbance of thyroid function, and, therefore, we considered the absence of histopathological findings to be indicative that an adverse functional change had not been initiated. Nonetheless, we recognize that thyroid histopathology is not a highly sensitive marker of thyrotoxicity, in that changes in thyroid weight may be predictive of a disturbance of thyroid function prior to the appearance of histological changes. We also recognize that thyroid weight relative to body weight is an important calculation in the evaluation of thyrotoxicity.²

Overall, while the toxicokinetics of HPMCAS and the potential methodological problems with the studies by Hoshi et al. suggest that the various effects (which do not correlate well within and across studies and do not appear suggestive of an underlying plausible biological mode of action) observed in these studies are likely artifactual, we acknowledge that the studies must be judged on the evidence at hand. Additionally, while it is possible to speculate regarding plausible biological explanations for some of the observed effects not being toxicologically relevant, the studies were lacking some parameters that could be corroborative of such explanations. Therefore, based on the available evidence, we accept FDA's determination of NOAELs of 1.25 g/kg bw 6 days per week for both the subchronic and chronic study by Hoshi et al.

Based on this determination, the high dose of the studies, 2.5 g/kg bw 6 days per week, should also be considered as a LOAEL, suggesting that, despite its known toxicokinetic data, HPMCAS may have exerted systemic effects in these studies and, therefore, necessitating the need to determine an ADI. Because of this, it was necessary that we re-evaluate the intended use of Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS and the exposure estimates for that use.

Intended Use/Exposure:

In GRN 960 we conducted an extremely conservative exposure estimate, assuming that HPMCAS would be present in all dietary supplements at the maximum addition concentration of 80% of core supplement weight. This resulted in an EDI at the 90th percentile of dietary supplement consumers of 47.1 mg/kg bw/day.

In terms of the Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS intended use applications (i.e., enteric coating agent, delayed release agent, carrier for solid dispersions, and an enteric agent in capsule shells), enteric coating on tablets is the major application in the dietary supplement industry, but enteric coating on capsules and as an enteric agent in capsule shells are also applications of interest. Maximum concentrations for the enteric coating and agent applications are much lower than the 80% addition concentration we applied to all dietary supplements in the original exposure assessment. Therefore, we have amended the intended use (Table 5 in GRN 960, Subpart 3.1, page 15) to remove the applications for delayed release agent in tables and solid dispersion in tables and granules.

We then applied the maximum concentrations used for the remaining applications within the tablet, granule, and capsule categories (as noted in GRN 960, no dietary supplement food codes used the term pellets), which resulted in the following amended Table 5:

In reality, only a minority of dietary supplements are expected to utilize an application for which HPMCAS is intended (i.e., enteric coating agent and an enteric agent in capsule shells). Therefore, we searched the 9,297 dietary supplement entries from the 2011–2012 NHANES dataset (the most recent dataset containing dietary supplement information) that were utilized for the original exposure assessment of GRN 960 for terms that could be associated with one of the aforementioned applications. Included search terms were enteric, time(d) release, sustained release, extended release, controlled release, delayed release, slow release, prolonged release, and solid dispersion as well as related terms, such as delivery systems and confirmed release, that could not be ruled out as possibly pertaining to one of the applications. This search resulted in identification of 302 unique codes (3.25% of the original dataset). We also searched the NIH Dietary Supplement Label Database (DSLDD) using the same terms and found that 343 of 2,792 dietary supplements (12.29%) contained within the databased utilized these terms.

Additionally, not all dietary supplements utilizing one of the above applications are expected to use HPMCAS as the agent. It would be highly conservative to assume that 10% of all such supplements would utilize HPMCAS. Nonetheless, to build extract caution into the assessment, we assumed that HPMCAS would capture 50% of the market for these applications in dietary supplements.

Because the DSLDD search suggests that the NHANES dataset may underestimate the number of dietary supplements utilizing one of the applications, we decided to continue our exposure estimates using the entire 9,297 codes of the original assessment. However, if the DSLDD percentage were doubled to 25% to build in additional buffer and market share was considered as a very conservative 50%, this would result in a very conservative estimate that 12.5% of all dietary supplements would contain HPMCAS. Based on this, we decided to apply a presence probability to the exposure assessment. The presence probability assumes that every time a consumer reaches for a dietary supplement, there would be an assigned random probability that that supplement would contain HPMCAS. To be even more conservative, we doubled the 12.5% estimate and applied a presence probability of 25% to the above assessment.

This resulted in EDIs at the mean and 90th percentile consumers in the total population 2 years of age and older of 169.5 mg/p (2.40 mg/kg/p) and 339.9 mg/p (4.80 mg/kg/p), respectively, as shown in new Tables 6b and 7b below.

Risk Characterization:

The pivotal NOAEL from toxicological studies was determined as 1.25 g/kg bw 6 days/week, equivalent to 1.071 g/kg bw/day (1071 mg/kg bw/day). Using an uncertainty factor of 100, the ADI was determined as 10.71 mg/kg bw/day (1071 mg/kg bw/day / 100).

The EDI was conservatively estimated as 4.80 mg/kg bw/day for the general US population of consumers 2 years old and above at the 90th percentile. As the 4.80 mg/kg bw/day < 10.71 mg/kg bw/day (EDI < ADI), we conclude that the intended use of Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS is reasonably certain to be safe.

In addition, the MOE (NOAEL/EDI; 1071 mg/kg bw/day / 4.80 mg/kg bw/day) is 223 (> 100), which additionally supports the conclusion that the intended use of Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS is reasonably certain to be safe.

Notifier Responses to July 22, 2021 Zoom Conference with FDA

Intended Use/Exposure:

In GRN 960 we conducted an extremely conservative exposure estimate, assuming that HPMCAS would be present in all dietary supplements at the maximum addition concentration of 80% of core supplement weight. This resulted in an EDI at the 90th percentile of dietary supplement consumers of 47.1 mg/kg bw/day.

Maximum concentrations for the enteric coating and agent applications are much lower than the 80% addition concentration we applied to all dietary supplements in the original exposure assessment. Therefore, we have amended the intended use (Table 5 in GRN 960, Subpart 3.1, page 15) to remove the applications for delayed release agent in tablets and solid dispersion in tablets and granules (also, as noted in GRN 960, no dietary supplement food codes used the term pellets), which resulted in the following amended Table 5:

The 2011–2012 NHANES dataset (the most recent dataset containing dietary supplement information) contains 9,297 dietary supplement food code entries. However, in reality, only a minority of dietary supplements are expected to utilize an application for which HPMCAS is intended (i.e., enteric coating agent and an enteric agent in capsule shells). Therefore, as the NHANES dietary supplement dataset does not contain specific subcategories for dietary supplements containing an enteric agent (or other similar applications), we searched each of the 9,297 dietary supplement entries that were utilized for the original exposure assessment of GRN 960 for terms that could be associated with one of the aforementioned applications. Included search terms were enteric, time(d) release, sustained release, extended release, controlled release, delayed release, slow release, prolonged release, and solid dispersion as well as related terms, such as delivery systems and confirmed release, that could not be ruled out as possibly pertaining to one of the applications. We also expanded our searches by searching compound terms for their components alone (e.g., we searched for 'release' alone rather than looking only for entries that contained both 'time' and 'release'); in other words, we searched both the logical 'AND' and the logical 'OR' conditions. We then evaluated each hit for appropriate context of the search term to ensure that all potentially relevant entries were included in our exposure analysis and that non-relevant entries were excluded (e.g., entries containing the compound term 'fast release' were excluded).

These searches resulted in identification of 302 unique codes (3.25% of the original dataset; see attached appendix documents for the list of codes utilized) that were used in our amended exposure analysis to represent 'consumers' as the subset of dietary supplement consumers who consume dietary supplements containing an enteric agent. We then applied the maximum concentrations of HPMCAS shown in amended Table 5 above within the tablet, granule, and capsule form categories of intended use. The results of this analysis are shown in Tables 6 and 7 below, as further amended.

Risk Characterization:

The pivotal NOAEL from toxicological studies was determined as 1.25 g/kg bw 6 days/week, equivalent to 1.071 g/kg bw/day (1071 mg/kg bw/day). Using an uncertainty factor of 100, the ADI was determined as 10.71 mg/kg bw/day (1071 mg/kg bw/day / 100).

The EDI was conservatively estimated as 6.15 mg/kg bw/day for the general US population of consumers 2 years old and above at the 90th percentile. As the 6.15 mg/kg bw/day < 10.71 mg/kg bw/day (EDI < ADI), we conclude that the intended use of Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS is reasonably certain to be safe.

In addition, the MOE (NOAEL/EDI; 1071 mg/kg bw/day / 6.15 mg/kg bw/day) is 174 (> 100), which additionally supports the conclusion that the intended use of Shin-Etsu AQOAT® HPMCAS is reasonably certain to be safe.
