Dear Ms. Henney,

12/29

We are writing to express our concern about the FDA's reluctance to limit, or ideally, abolish, the animal use of growth-promoting antibiotics used in human medicine. We are concerned that this use will lead to a rise in untreatable infectious diseases as the European Union has expressed.

The least acceptable solution in our eyes, would be to require labels on the products that have been exposed to such antibiotics. We feel this is of great importance to give people the freedom of choice between what has been chemically treated and what has not. Without this information people will have no idea what they may ingesting into their systems.

As parents of a young child we feel that the US Government needs to take a strong stand on delivering information to consumers to permit those consumers to make educated decisions on what products they want to purchase and what principles they want to support.

Thanks for your time.

Sincerely,

Sarah and Adam
