To Whom It May Concern:

If the FDA really wants to improve food labels to better help people in making healthy choices, they can add to the information concerning calories, fat, and serving sizes the information on where the product is grown so that consumers can identify products grown in the United States of America. They should also disallow meat processors from injecting the meat with sodium chloride to increase the weight, thereby cheating the customer. They should also identify genetically altered food so that consumers can pick natural products. Of course, I don't expect you to do any of the above since the FDA is an organization that does not protect the citizenry but only wishes to control it.

Sincerely yours,
